The authorities support this position:

"When either the general law or the charter of the corporation prescribes the mode in which by-laws may be adopted, the by-laws which the corporation seeks to make must be adopted in such mode in order to be valid." 1 Fletcher, Cyc. Corp. § 487.

"By-laws are made by the stockholders in meeting assembled." 1 Cook on Corp. p. 21; 2 Cook on Corp. § 625.

"By-laws, to be valid, whether made by the stockholders or directors, must be adopted at a meeting called and conducted in accordance with law." 3 Clark & M. on Private Corp. p. 1955.

"It has been said that the existence of a by-law may be shown by proof of custom, or by acts of acquiescence of the members of the corporation, or by the uniform procedure of the corporation. But the import of the cases is not so much that the custom may take the place of a by-law, but that it may be resorted to as evidence of the adoption of a by-law." 1 Thompson on Corp. § 991.

"Custom itself does not take the place of a by-law, but is merely evidence that such a by-law has been adopted." Boisot on By-laws (2d Ed.) § 9.

There are a few cases which hold that a by-law may be proved by implication and by custom; but we have found no case, and our attention has not been called to any, which goes to the length of holding that a by-law may be created or adopted by usage where statutory law, as in this state, requires it to be in writing and adopted by a formal vote of two-thirds of the members at a meeting called and assembled, or by the written assent of two-thirds of the members.

The plaintiff did not vote at the meeting held in December, 1920, nor has he made any representations or done any act which would, as asserted by respondent, estop him from contesting the validity of the election here in controversy.

It follows from the foregoing that the petitioner is entitled to a peremptory writ of mandate requiring the respondents to hold an annual election, and to hold the same in the manner and method provided by section 321b of the Civil Code.

Let the writ issue.

BOWEN v. CREIGHTON et al. (Civ. 3684.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. May 6, 1921. Rehearing Denied June 4, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 5, 1921.)

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Frank J. Murasky, Judge.

Mandamus by Walter M. Bowen, in behalf of himself and all other members of the Marine Engineers' Beneficial Association, No. 35, against E. A. Creighton and others. Writ denied, and petitioner appeals. Reversed.

Geo. D. Collins, Jr., of San Francisco, for appellant.

Bell, Brookman, Simmons & Creech, of San Francisco, for respondents.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal by petitioner from a judgment in a special proceeding prosecuted under the provisions of sections 312 to 315 of the Civil Code, to annul and set aside an election of officers of the defendant corporation held in the month of December, 1919.

The facts in this case, and the case of Edward J. Powers v. Marine Engineers' Beneficial Ass'n et al. (No. 3778) 199 Pac. 353, this day decided, are substantially the same, and the points raised in this case are disposed of by what we have said in the last-named case, except as to respondent Thomas Healey, who in the election of officers in the year 1919 was elected for a term of five years. It follows from what we have said, in the case of Edward J. Powers v. Marine Engineers' Beneficial Ass'n that the election for the year 1919 was void, and that there should be a new election to fill the office now held by said respondent Healey.

1. Appeal and error ⊂=1008(1)—Finding not disturbed unless unmistakably shown to be erroneous.

A finding of the trial court will not be disturbed unless the evidence unmistakably shows it to be erroneous.

2. Boundaries ⊂=48(7)—Adjoining owners not bound by mistaken understanding as to location of boundary.

Adjoining owners were not bound by their mistaken understanding as to location of boundary in the absence of an agreement fixing such location as the boundary.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Louis W. Meyers, Judge.

Action by John Huddart and another against J. A. McGuirk and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

John E. Daly and James H. Daly, both of Long Beach, for appellants.

A. Guard Hill and Samuel Weil, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

OLNEY, J. The parties to the action may be considered as a single plaintiff and a single defendant. The action is one of ejectment. The plaintiff secured judgment after trial, and the defendant appeals.

The plaintiff and defendant are the owners of adjoining tracts of land, and the dispute is as to the proper boundary line between them. The two tracts were once a single parcel, of which the plaintiff's land is the eastern half and the defendant's the western. The tracts were conveyed by the original owner of the entire parcel by descriptions by metes and bounds, and the plaintiff claims that the boundary line is that located by survey according to the calls of these descriptions. The defendant claims that the boundary is a line some 30 feet to the east, marked for a portion of the way by a ditch. The distance between the two lines is some 30 feet.

[1] Since the boundary line as the plaintiff claims it to be is the line as determined by the calls in the respective deeds under which the parties hold, it is evident that that line is the correct line unless the defendant was able to show that in some valid manner a different line had been determined upon. The finding of the court was against any such determination, and, unless the evidence unmistakably shows that such a determination was nevertheless had, the judgment must be affirmed.

There was no fence between the properties nor any other thing whose apparent purpose would be to separate the two tracts, nor was there originally any fixing or marking of the boundary. The defendant relies upon subsequent agreements between himself and the then owners of the plaintiff's tract fixing the ditch line and the continuation of it as the boundary line. He testifies to four conversations between himself and different owners of the plaintiff's tract which might be claimed to amount to agreements of this character. These conversations were respectively with one Foreman, one Roberts, one Saylin, and the plaintiff himself. His testimony as to the conversations with Foreman and the plaintiff was flatly contradicted by them. His testimony as to the conversation with Saylin is uncorroborated and was not of such a character that we cannot say the court was not justified in disbelieving it. His testimony as to the conversation with Roberts is corroborated by the testimony of the latter, but here again the testimony of both the defendant and Roberts is not of such a character as absolutely to require the court to give full credence to it. Furthermore, it is very doubtful if any of the conversations as testified to, with the possible exception of that with Foreman, can be said to amount to agreements fixing a boundary line as to which there was a dispute, or as to whose true location the parties were in doubt. This was a necessary element in any valid agreement fixing the line as other than the true line.

[2] The conversations hardly amounted to more than statements that each party understood the ditch line to be the true line. This is a very different thing from fixing a disputed or doubtful boundary, and if in fact the understanding of the parties as to the location of the true line was in error, they are not bound by their mistaken understanding. Clapp v. Churchill, 164 Cal. 741, 130 Pac. 1061.

There was also testimony by former owners of the plaintiff's property that they supposed the ditch was on the line or about on the line, and by one at least of such former owners that he had told a purchaser that the ditch was the line or on the line. But it was wholly immaterial what former owners of the plaintiff's tract believed as to the location of the line, or what they told those who had purchased or were purchasing from them. The boundary could neither be shifted nor fixed by their belief or by their statements to those in privity with themselves. It could be shifted only in the manner prescribed for the transfer of interests in real property, and it could be fixed, in case its true location was in dispute or not known, only by agreement with the then owner of the other tract. Clapp v. Churchill, supra.

Stress is laid upon the fact that for years, without objection, the defendant cultivated up to the ditch on his side, and the plaintiff and the former owners of his tract up to the ditch on their side. But the acquiescence so shown was material only as evidence that there was an agreement between the owners of the respective tracts fixing the boundary whose true location was theretofore uncertain. Clapp v. Churchill, supra. It is sufficient for the purposes of the present case to say that the acquiescence shown was not of such a nature as to require the conclusion that it was in conformity to an agreement fixing a disputed or uncertain boundary line, or that it itself amounted to such an agreement. In fact we would say that the evidence as a whole quite decidedly supports the implied finding of the trial court that such acquiescence as was shown was merely in what the parties mistakenly believed to be the true line without any notion on their part of fixing a disputed or uncertain boundary.

We might add as a circumstance of some little weight that the ditch was not of such a character as actually to separate the properties. It was shallow, being only about a foot deep, was ploughed over from time to time, extended only part way across the properties, and, the plaintiff testifies, was not there at all when he purchased.

The case may be summed up by saying that the defendant's evidence was not such as to require the trial court to find that there had been a valid agreement fixing as the boundary a line other than the true line as called for by the descriptions in the respective deeds under which the parties hold. This being true, the judgment cannot be reversed.

Judgment affirmed.

RUPPE et al. v. CITY OF LOS ANGELES et al. (L. A. 6110.)

1. Master and servant ⊜305—Employer liable for employee's assault in course of employment, though contrary to instructions.

Where a city's employee, sent to wire a building and set electric meters therein, committed an assault on plaintiff, in charge thereof, it is immaterial to the city's liability whether or not the assault was authorized by it, or was committed by its employee in violation of his instructions, having been an act done by him in the course of his employment.

2. Master and servant ⊜306—Master not liable for servant's willful wrong outside employment.

A master is not liable, where his servant steps aside from his employment to do a willful wrong.

3. Master and servant ⊜302(3)—Assault held committed by employee within scope of employment.

In an action against a city for injuries to plaintiff from an assault by the city's employee, sent to the building of which plaintiff had charge to wire it for electricity and set meters therein, evidence that the assault was committed by the city's employee while endeavoring to open a door against plaintiff's resistance, for the purpose of going on with his work, justified a finding that the assault was committed in the course of the city employee's employment.

4. Master and servant ⊜330(3) — Evidence held to show assaulted party's authority.

In an action against a city for damages from an assault committed by the city's employee, sent to wire and set electric meters in a building of which plaintiff had charge, evidence held sufficient to justify finding that plaintiff had authority from the owner of the building to stop the going on of the work.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John W. Shenk, Judge.

Action by Doris Ruppe and others against the City of Los Angeles and others. From a judgment for plaintiffs, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Albert Lee Stephens, W. B. Mathews, Charles S. Burnell, Trent G. Anderson, Ray C. Eberhard and Lewis E. Whitehead, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Hibbard & Kleindienst, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

OLNEY, J. The defendants may be considered as one for the purposes of discussion, and that one the city of Los Angeles. From a judgment against it for $500, had after a trial without a jury, the city appeals.

The complaint alleges, and the court finds, that the defendant was engaged in the business of supplying electric energy for light and power to its inhabitants, and had in its employ as a meter setter one Nealon; that Nealon, with certain fellow employees of the city, was sent by it to wire a certain building and set meters therein, so that electric energy might be furnished by the city in the building; that the plaintiff was in charge of the building, and attempted to prevent Nealon and his fellow workmen from entering and doing the work they had been sent to do; and that Nealon, in order to force his way into a certain portion of the building for the purpose of there doing some work, assaulted the plaintiff, inflicting personal injuries upon her. For these injuries a recovery was sought by the complaint and allowed by the judgment appealed from.

[1] The evidence as to the commission of the assault was conflicting, and the finding of the trial court upon that issue is conclusive, and is not attacked. The chief contention of the city is that, upon the facts alleged and upon the evidence, it is not liable for the assault. Its point is that it is not alleged, and the evidence does not show, that the assault was authorized by the city; that, in fact, the evidence shows without contradiction that it was contrary to Nealon's express instructions. It is, however, wholly immaterial whether or not the assault was authorized by the city, or was committed by Nealon in violation of his instructions. It is plain enough that it was committed by him in the course of doing that which he had been sent to the building by the city to do, and in furtherance of its doing; that it was, in other words, an act done by him in the course of his employment. The rule is elementary that a master is responsible for the acts of his servant done in the course of his employment, even though those acts be unauthorized or contrary to the master's explicit instructions. As between the master and third persons, the acts of the servant, done as a part of the doing of that which he is employed to do, are as if done by the master himself, and the question of authority as between the master and servant to do the particular acts is quite immaterial. Cooley on Torts (3d Ed.) pp. 1016–1030; section 2338, Civ. Code; Rounds v. Delaware, etc., Co., 64 N. Y. 129, 21 Am. Rep. 597; Otis Elevator Co. v. First Nat. Bk., 163 Cal. 31, 39, 124 Pac. 704, 41 L. R. A. (N. S.) 529; Johnson v. Monson, 190 Pac. 635.

[2, 3] Reliance is placed by the defendant upon the authority of Rahmel v. Lehndorff, 142 Cal. 681, 76 Pac. 659, 65 L. R. A. 88, 100 Am. St. Rep. 154. It is there said:

"By the general law of master and servant, the master is not liable for the malicious torts of the servant committed outside the scope of his employment. The wrongful act must be one which the servant is empowered under some circumstances to do."

But the court was there speaking of an act malicious on the part of the servant, an intentional doing by him of a wrongful act. A master is, of course, not liable where his servant steps aside from his employment to do a willful wrong, and frequently the willful or malicious character of his act is quite material in determining whether he did so step aside or was truly going on with his master's business. But even if the act be malicious or willful, and yet be one done in furtherance of the purpose of the servant's employment, the master is liable. This is plainly implied in the first sentence quoted from Rahmel v. Lehndorff, and is the thoroughly well-established rule. See the preceding reference to Cooley on Torts. In the present case, in the first place it is not found that the assault complained of was malicious, and in the second place it is found that it was committed in the course of Nealon's employment. This finding is justified by the evidence, which shows that the assault was committed by Nealon while endeavoring to open a door against the plaintiff's resistance for the purpose of going on with his work.

Something, perhaps, should also be said as to the statement in the second sentence quoted from Rahmel v. Lehndorff, that—

"The wrongful act must be one which the servant is empowered under some circumstances to do."

If this be taken to mean that the act must be one which the servant is authorized under some circumstances to do, the statement is undoubtedly too narrow. A very simple illustration will make this plain. A servant employed to drive an automobile exceeds the legal speed limit and as a result injures some third person. It will not be questioned that the master is liable. This would be true, no matter how explicitly the master had instructed the servant never to exceed the speed limit, and although the exceeding of that limit is a crime, and something which it cannot be presumed the servant was authorized to do under any circumstances. It would be true, because the master has intrusted the servant with the driving of the automobile, and, having done so, is responsible for what the servant does in driving it. In other words, while the master has not empowered the servant to break the law, in the sense that he has authorized him to do so, he has empowered him, in the sense that he has intrusted him with the performance of a duty, in whose performance it is possible for him to break the law. The word "empowered," as used in the sentence quoted, must be taken to mean empowered in this sense, and not in the sense of "authorized." Within the rule of the sentence quoted, as so interpreted, the assault by Nealon falls, and his master, the city, is responsible for it.

[4] The only other point made by the city is that the plaintiff had no authority whatever to stop the city's employees from wiring and metering the building, and was a gratuitous intruder upon them in their work. But, whether this be material or not, the trial court found to the contrary, and the finding is supported by the evidence. The building contained four flats, of which one was rented and occupied by the plaintiff, and the others were unoccupied. She was intrusted by the owner with the keys of the building, showed the unrented flats to prospective tenants, and rented them, and, according to her testimony, was in immediate charge of the building with authority to keep trespassers out. She also testifies that when the city's employees came to the building she telephoned to the daughter of the owner, who had full authority, and received from her authority to stop the going on of the work. This testimony was certainly sufficient to sustain the finding mentioned.

Judgment affirmed.

SKIDMORE et al. v. WEST, County Treasurer. (Sac. 2992.)

1. Counties ⇐48—Gathering of information with view to supervisors' proceeding in matter of land sold to state for taxes may not be required of county officers.

Pol. Code, § 4041, subd. 1, giving the board of supervisors power to require the making of reports by all county officers, is limited to such reports as they are required by law to make and such other reports as are incidental to the supervisors' general supervision, and they may not require the tax collector, county auditor and county recorder to examine certain records of the county officers, state surveyor general's office, and the United States land office with relation to lands sold to the state for taxes for many years delinquent prior to 1912 and a report to the supervisors with recommendations for further disposition, but may contract with other parties for the furnishing of such information with a view to the supervisors taking further proceedings.

2. Counties ⇐113(4)—Board of supervisors may contract with third persons for furnishing of information not the duty of officers to furnish.

In view of Pol. Code, § 3897. as amended in 1905 (St. 1905, p. 31) and 1913 (St. 1913, p. 559), relating to tax sales and the discretionary power vested in the board of supervisors, the matter of acquiring information deemed essential to a proper determination of the question whether there was unredeemed property sold to the state for taxes as to which it was advisable to initiate proceedings for sale, in view of the consequent risk of expense to the county and of the amount for which the property could be sold, with a view to recommending a lower price, if advisable, not being the official duty of any county officer, the board could contract for the same with a compensation of a part of the amount received by the county.

3. Counties ⟸113(4) — Supervisor's contract for furnishing information as to unredeemed lands sold for taxes not construed as including duties of county officials so as to render it invalid.

For the purpose of invalidating a contract between the county board of supervisors and third persons for furnishing information as to unredeemed lands sold to the state for taxes, a requirement that they report their recommendations as to further disposition of property involved and submit "lists for authorization from the state controller to advertise and sell under section 3897, Pol. Code," will not, because of the requirement for submitting lists, be construed as referring to actual manual work of preparing the resolutions of the board or applications to be made by the tax collector to the state controller, which duties are enjoined on officials.

4. Counties ⟸113(4)—Contract to furnish information to determine proceedings as to land sold for taxes not invalid because officers are required to furnish some of the information.

A contract with the board of supervisors to furnish certain information preliminary to determining proceedings, as to lands sold to state for taxes, is not rendered invalid because the duty to furnish some of such information is required of officers by Pol. Code, §§ 3716, 3728, since they refer to reports of "debts" due the county, which the county officials are required to report on, and after the land was sold to the state for taxes there was no longer any "debt" or "indebtedness" due the county in the sense of those words as used in the statutes.

5. Counties ⟸126—Courts are not concerned with the wisdom of a county's contract in the absence of fraud or mistake.

With regard to the wisdom of a contract between a county and parties who were thereunder to furnish information for the supervisors' proceeding in regard to the lands sold to the state for taxes, and particularly with regard to the method and amount of compensation provided, the courts have nothing to do, in the absence of fraud or mistake.

Wilbur, J., dissenting.

In Bank.

Application by C. E. Skidmore and another for a writ of mandamus directed to George C. West, Treasurer of Placer County, to compel payment of a warrant for services in collection of delinquent taxes. Writ granted.

Raymond Benjamin, of San Francisco, for petitioners.

J. B. Landis, of Auburn, and Fred P. Tuttle, Jr., both of Auburn, and Meredith, Landis & Chester, of Sacramento, for respondent.

Hugh B. Bradford, of Sacramento, and C. C. McDonald, of Woodland, amici curiæ.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. This is a mandamus proceeding to compel the payment by respondent, treasurer of Placer county, of a warrant for $2,231.48 issued by the county auditor upon a claim of petitioners allowed by the board of supervisors of the county. The matter was submitted upon a general demurrer to the petition. The only question presented is whether the purported contract between petitioners and the county of Placer, made on behalf of the county by its board of supervisors, was in excess of the authority of such board and therefore void.

The material facts shown by the petition are substantially as follows:

On March 5, 1918, more than 1,000 parcels of land in Placer county which had been sold to the state for delinquent state and county taxes, the delinquency in such case being prior to 1912, remained unredeemed and unsold by the state, and none of the assessments thereon had ever been canceled. The result was that Placer county had not received any of the money coming to it on any of said assessments. Under these circumstances the board of supervisors entered into the contract here involved with petitioners, neither of whom was an officer of the county. The contract is evidenced by a resolution of the board, and is as follows:

"It is ordered that C. E. Skidmore and A. L. Kramer be and they are hereby authorized to check deeds to the state, by the tax collector of Placer county, California, for delinquent taxes as shown in Books of Tax Deeds numbered 1 to 9, inclusive, covering approximately 1,000 deeds, that do not show redemption cancellation or sale on deeds or certificates of sale, and submit report covering each deed together with recommendations as to further disposition of same and submit lists for authorization from state controller to advertise and sell as provided for by section 3897, P. C., and that in payment of such services the county of Placer will pay said Skidmore and Kramer a commission equal in amount to 50 per cent. of Placer county's proportion of all moneys collected from and after this date from redemption or sales of property which has gone delinquent to the county prior to the year 1912.

"Said 50 per cent. commission is based upon the county's proportion of money received after this date, and applies only to money actually collected by the county.

"Payments to be made at the time of the regular monthly meetings of the board of supervisors for the amounts due on said date.

"No payments to be made, however, until the said Skidmore and Kramer have furnished an affidavit setting forth that they have check-ed the records at the United States land office, the state surveyor general's office, the county recorder's office, and the county auditor's office, and have submitted to the board of supervisors their report and recommendations as hereinabove provided, and until a certificate is received from the county auditor showing the amount that has been paid to the county as its share of the money collected from such redemption sales of property examined and reported on by said Skidmore and Kramer from date hereof.

"Dated this 5th day of March, 1918."

The work so contracted for was fully completed by petitioners, and the result of the action initiated by the supervisors upon the report of petitioners was that between March 5, 1918, and August 29, 1918, there was paid into the county treasury as Placer county's proportion on account of redemptions and sales of said parcels of land the sum of $4,462.96. Under the terms of the contract petitioners are entitled to a sum equal to one-half of this amount, and this is the sum specified in their warrant, which the treasurer refuses to pay.

It is conceded by learned counsel for petitioners that authority in law is essential to action by the board of supervisors, and that such board is without authority in law to contract with private parties for the performance of duties which the law enjoins upon county officers.

[1] In so far as its express terms are concerned, we are not strongly impressed by the claim that this contract provided for the performance by petitioners of duties which the law enjoins upon officers of the county. According to such terms it appears to be confined, in so far as petitioners are concerned, to an examination of certain records in certain county offices, the state surveyor general's office, and the United States land office, with relation to the parcels of real estate sold to the state for taxes delinquent prior to the year 1912, which covered a period of many years, and a report thereon to the supervisors with their recommendations as to further disposition, accompanied by lists for authorization from the state controller for sale by the tax collector. And this was for the information of the board of supervisors, with a view to further proceedings by them. The county offices involved were those of the tax collector, the county auditor, and the county recorder. We find no statute enjoining upon any of these officers the duty to make in their respective offices the examination and report thus called for, even if called upon by the supervisors to so do. An examination of the statutes prescribing their duties fails to disclose anything that can fairly be so construed. Respondent relies in this connection upon subdivision 1 of section 4041, Political Code, the section prescribing the powers of the board of supervisors, which says they have power "to supervise the official conduct of all county officers; * * * to see that they faithfully perform their duties, direct prosecutions for delinquencies, and, when necessary, require them to renew their official bonds, make reports and present their books and accounts for inspection." Manifestly the provision here as to the power to require the making of reports is limited to such reports as the officers are required by law to make and to such other reports as are incidental to the general supervision given to the supervisors of the official conduct of the officers. The case of County of Humboldt v. Stern, 136 Cal. 63, 68 Pac. 324, also relied on, is not in point for the reason that the office there involved was that of county clerk, the incumbent of which was under the law ex officio clerk of the board of supervisors, and who by express mandate of law was required to "perform all other duties required by law, or any rule or order of the board." It was very properly held therein that it was his official duty, in response to an order of the board, to furnish the board with data from its records. The words of the contract here were very carefully limited to services to be performed for the board of supervisors with a view to such action as they might properly and advisedly take under the law looking to proceedings for the sale by the state of unredeemed property sold to the state for taxes, in order that the amount of money due the county on account thereof might be obtained and paid into the county treasury, and we cannot see that in any respect it called for the performance of duties which were enjoined by law upon any county officer.

[2] In the determination of the question of the power of the board of supervisors to contract for the services here involved, we are brought to a consideration of the question of the functions and powers of the board with regard to property sold to the state for taxes. When property is thus sold under our system, the county does not receive its portion of the tax until the property is redeemed or sold under direction of the state controller by the tax collector of the county. Until the year 1905, section 3897 left the matter of such a sale entirely in the hands of the state controller, providing for a sale by the county tax collector only on direction of the controller, and in so far as the law was concerned there was nothing for any other officer or for the county to do in the matter until the controller gave such direction. As is still true, every step subsequent to such direction, both as to redemption and sale, was prescribed by statute, and the public officer by whom it was to be taken designated. The supervisors had no function whatever to perform in the matter. While the law was in this condition, the case of House v. Los Angeles Co., 104 Cal. 73, 37 Pac. 796, was decided. The supervisors of Los Angeles county made a contract with one House under which the latter was to collect from owners, by causing them to redeem, what might be due on account of taxes on real estate sold to the state, and for which services he was to be paid a percentage (15 per cent.) on the account so collected. It was held, after a careful review of the statutes relative to the matter, that the board of supervisors had no voice whatever in the matter and could not intervene to accelerate or retard a redemption, and that, the law having confided the duties to be performed in such matters to officers specially designated for their discharge, the supervisors have no authority, express or implied, in the premises, and hence that the contract was beyond the power conferred upon the board. The opinion as a whole clearly holds, as is stated in a syllabus, that the supervisors had no power or authority to enter into a contract with a private individual to proceed and cause to be collected from owners what may be due on account of sales of real estate made to the state for delinquent taxes, and to pay him a percentage upon such collections, and also that the supervisors had no function whatever to perform in the matter. If it had not been for certain amendments of section 3897, Political Code, there could be no claim, in view of this decision, that the contract here involved was valid. These amendments are here relied upon by petitioners. The amendment of 1905 (St. 1905, p. 31) modified the effect of a provision of the section that at the sale no bid shall be accepted "for less than the amount of all the taxes levied upon such property, and all interest, costs, penalties and expenses up to the date of such sale," by providing further that, if the board of supervisors of the county shall, by resolution entered on their minutes, declare that in their judgment the property described in the resolution "is not at that time of value great enough that it can be sold by the state" for such a sum, and that it would be to the best interest of the state to sell for a lesser sum, to be stated in the resolution, "upon receipt of a copy of said resolution, certified by the clerk of said board of supervisors, the state controller may thereupon, by written authorization, direct the tax collector to sell for such lesser sum." In 1913 (St. 1913, p. 559) the section was further amended by the addition of a proviso which impliedly authorizes the board of supervisors to direct the tax collector of the county "to apply for an authorization of sale of any property which has been deeded to the state" and to "authorize him to order the necessary advertising [in case a sale is authorized by the controller] to be done at county expense." These are the material amendments relied on. Their effect was to devolve certain functions in the matter of the sales on the board of supervisors, for the exercise of their judgment and discretion. Those functions substantially were: First, in the event that their judgment was that any property sold to the state for taxes was not of value great enough to sell for the whole amount due, and that it would be to the best interest of the state to sell for a lower specified sum, to so say by resolution, a certified copy of which transmitted to the state controller would authorize him to fix a lower sale price; and, second, to direct the tax collector to apply to the state controller for an authorization to sell any property deeded to the state, and to authorize him (the tax collector) to do the necessary advertising at the county expense. It cannot be doubted that the board of supervisors had the power to obtain such information as was reasonably essential to a proper discharge of these functions, even to the extent of contracting for the furnishing thereof at the expense of the county, if it was not the official duty of some county officer to furnish the same, for it is well settled that such a board has such powers as are necessary to the discharge of duties imposed by law. We cannot say that any of the information required by the contract here involved may not reasonably have been deemed by the board essential to a proper determination of the question whether there was unredeemed property as to which it was advisable to initiate proceedings for a sale in view of the consequent risk of expense to the county, and of the question of the amount for which the property could be sold, with a view to recommending a lower price where it was deemed inadvisable to proceed on the basis of the whole amount due. Necessarily the board must be held to be invested with considerable discretionary power in determining what information is essential to its intelligent action, and in such matters the courts may not properly interfere unless it is apparent that the service contracted for has no possible relation whatever to a proper discharge of its functions.

[3] Special objection is made as to the requirement of the contract that petitioners should include with their report their "recommendations as to further disposition of the property" involved, and should submit "lists for authorization from state controller to advertise and sell under 3897 Political Code." As to the recommendations, which were, of course, simply an expression of the conclusion of the investigation whether or not, in view of the data, which they had collected as to title and value, sale proceedings could be initiated to advantage, we feel that it cannot fairly be held that the board was without power to have for its guidance the advice contracted for. Exactly what was meant by the requirement that lists for authorization from the state controller should be submitted we do not know, but we do not feel warranted in construing it for the purpose of invalidating the contract, as referring to the actual manual work of preparing the resolutions of the board or the applications to be made by the tax collector to the controller in the event that such application is directed by the board. These, of course, would be duties enjoined upon officials. We are inclined to the view that it means no more than that the petitioners must submit as a part of their report a list of the unredeemed properties as to which the board may properly take action.

[4] It has been suggested here that certain sections of the Political Code other than section 4041 enjoin upon certain county officers the duty to make reports which would furnish some of the required information. Consideration of those sections has satisfied us that this may not fairly be held. In so far as those sections refer to reports of "debts" due the county, they can hardly be held to cover anything here involved, for after sale and deed to the state for the taxes there is no longer any "debt" or "indebtedness" due the county in the real sense of those words, or in the sense contemplated by these sections. See section 3716, Pol. Code. In so far as certain other sections are concerned, as, for instance, section 3728, Political Code, the reference is only to ordinary current reports which would not cover any period of time involved in the work here contracted for by the board. For instance, the report called for by section 3728, Political Code, is an annual report to be prepared "from the 'assessment book' of" the current year. It seems to us an undue strain of any of the sections to which reference is made, either in the opinion previously filed or in any of the briefs, to find therein authority for the proposition that in contracting for the work called for the supervisors included work within the scope of the lawful duty of any county officer to perform.

[5] With the question of the wisdom of this contract in so far as the county was concerned, and especially with regard to the method and amount of compensation provided, the courts have nothing to do, in the absence of a claim of fraud or mistake. There is no pretense of any such claim in this matter. The question in this proceeding is simply one as to the power of the board, and in view of the amendments to section 3897, Political Code, we see no escape from the conclusion that the contract was one within the power of the board to make, and that the petitioners are entitled to the relief sought. It should be noted that this was the conclusion of the District Court of Appeals of the Third Appellate District, which court first heard the matter.

Let a peremptory writ of mandate issue as prayed in the petition.

We concur: OLNEY, J.; SHAW, J.; LAWLOR, J.; LENNON, J.; SLOANE, J.

WILBUR, J. I dissent. The petition and argument upon rehearing have not changed my opinion in regard to the matter. In view of the fact that many of the Code sections cited in the previous opinions have not been discussed by the parties in their briefs, it was proper to grant a rehearing for the purpose of considering such arguments as might be presented in regard to their meaning or effect. Nothing has been presented, however, which changes my opinion in the matter, although it is true that there was an inadvertent statement in the opinion concerning the effect of section 3680 of the Political Code, it being the duty of the tax collector, and not the assessor, to mark upon the tax bills the words "Sold to the state." Omitting the words "and tax bills" thus inadvertently used, and also omitting the statement of facts which is contained in the main opinion, that opinion is as follows:

"The work so contracted for was fully completed by respondents, and the result of the action initiated by the supervisors upon the report of respondents was that between March 5, 1918, and August 29, 1918, there was paid into the county treasury as Placer county's proportion on account of redemptions and sales of said parcels of land the sum of $4,462.96. Under the terms of the contract petitioners are entitled to a sum equal to one-half of this amount, and this is the sum specified in their warrant which the treasurer refuses to pay.

"If the action of the board of supervisors was unwarranted in law, in whole or in part, the petitioners are not entitled to the writ. The respondent claims that it was the duty of county officials to perform a very substantial part of the labor that the petitioners agreed to perform, and that the contract was therefore void, citing as authority for that conclusion County of Humboldt v. Stern, 136 Cal. 63, 68 Pac. 324, wherein it was held that, as it was the duty of the county clerk to 'perform all other duties required by law, or any rule or order of the board,' it was his duty to furnish the board such data from the records of his office as they might require. In this case the contract required the petitioners to examine the records of the tax collector and report the result to the supervisors for the purpose of securing the authority of the state controller for a sale as provided by section 3897, Pol. Code. Petitioners were also to 'check the records in the county auditor's office.' If it was the duty of the tax collector, or of the auditor or other county officer, to furnish the required data, the supervisors could not under their general powers employ other persons to perform such duties of such county officers at the expense of the county. The provisions of the law fixing the powers and duties of the various officers of the state and county in respect to the assessment and collection of taxes before and after delinquency are found in numerous provisions of the Political Code relating to taxation and to county government. The powers and duties of the board of supervisors are defined in section 4041, Pol. Code, subdivision 1 of which provides that they shall have power 'to supervise the official conduct of all county officers * * * to see that they faithfully perform their duties, direct prosecutions for delinquencies, and, when necessary, require them to renew their official bonds, make reports and present their books and accounts for inspection.' This power would give the supervisors access to all the information needed, or by petitioners agreed to be furnished, from such records. If it be doubted whether the power to require the officers 'to make reports' is sufficiently broad to require them to search the records to determine the amount of unpaid taxes due upon property sold to the state, there are other sections of the Code requiring reports from county officers concerning the financial condition of the county which may properly be considered in that connection. * * * Section 3737, Political Code, requires an annual report of the auditor in regard to the financial condition of the county, including a statement of the indebtedness of the county, the property of the county, the amount in the treasury subject to the payment of such indebtedness, the rate of taxation, the assessed value of the property in detail for the year, and 'Fifth, such other information as the board of supervisors or the controller of the state may require.' There is little doubt that the supervisors would be entitled under this section to require a list of the deeds made to the state as shown by the auditor's books, if by reason of a plan to enforce payment thereof such information was necessary to determine the financial status of the county and its fiscal policy, particularly as the auditor is required each year to compile for the assessor 'a complete and true statement of all property which has been redeemed under or by virtue of any sale made to the state for delinquent taxes, together with a complete and true statement of all property sold to the state and remaining unredeemed.' Section 3678, Pol. Code, and amendment 1917 (St. 1917, p. 430). See, also, section 3739, Pol. Code. This list would include all property sold to the state, whether deeded or not, as it is subject to redemption both before and after such deed. Pol. Code, §§ 3780, 3817. Such information is necessary for the assessor, for until the deed he must continue to assess the property (Pol. Code, § 3813), and mark upon the assessment and tax bills therefor 'Sold to the state,' with date of sale (Pol. Code, § 3680), and after deed should omit such assessment (see Pol. Code, §§ 3787, 3607, 3813, 3773) until the property again passes into private ownership by reason of sale or redemption, which fact must be reported by the tax collector or auditor as the case may be, to the assessor annually (Pol. Code, § 3898, amended Stats. 1907, p. 699; Stats. 1913, p. 560, subd. 3; Stats. 1917, p. 715, subd. 3, § 3739; Stats. 1897, p. 431). By section 4099, Political Code, the treasurer and auditor are required quarterly to make a joint report to the board of supervisors, and at such other time as the board may require, showing the sources of county revenue, distribution of the revenue into funds, the total amount of warrants drawn and paid, and to 'generally make a full and specific showing of the financial condition of the county.' It must be obvious that, where uncollected taxes form a sufficiently important item of county revenue to justify an unusual effort to collect such taxes, such financial statement or report should include a detailed statement of such taxes, if so required by the board of supervisors. The state controller is ordinarily charged with the duty to direct the sale of lands deeded to the state (section 3897, Pol. Code), and upon such authorization it is the duty of the tax collecter to give the necessary notice of sale, and for that purpose to prepare the necessary lists of lands to be sold. The supervisors, however, may by resolution direct the tax collector to apply to the state controller for authority to sell, and in that event to make the advertising expenses a county charge. They may also, in the event that they so find the fact, certify their opinion that certain properties so deeded to the state are not of sufficient value to sell for the amount of the tax.

It is upon these provisions of the law, added by amendment after the decision of this court in House v. Los Angeles, 104 Cal. 73, 37 Pac. 796, that petitioners rely to distinguish their contract from the contract there held invalid. The power of the supervisors to enter into the contract in this case is asserted on the ground they were entitled to have before them the information which petitioners agreed to furnish, in order that they might determine therefrom whether or not to direct the tax collector to apply for authority to sell and whether or not to certify that some of the lands deeded to the state were worth so much less than the taxes thereon as to require an authorization for a sale for less than such tax, penalties, and costs. It is not claimed that the supervisors found any piece of property so deeded to be of such small value as to require the latter resolution, nor is it claimed that there were any circumstances which indicated the necessity of an investigation to ascertain that fact. We may assume, however, for the purposes of this decision, that the authority of the board of supervisors to initiate proceedings for the sale of property deeded to the state was sufficient to authorize them to secure such data as was necessary to determine the desirability of initiating such proceedings, and the question of whether or not they should invoke an authorization from the controller to sell for less than the total amount of taxes, penalties, and costs. It is clear from the foregoing provisions of the Political Code with reference to the duty of county officers to furnish reports and information required by the board of supervisors in relation to county finances, etc., that it was the duty of such officers, when required by the board of supervisors, to furnish all data necessary, to show the amount of unpaid taxes, penalties, etc., upon land deeded to the state, and the amount of land so deeded, together with such other information ascertainable from their respective books and records as the supervisors deem necessary for their enlightenment in exercising their authority in the premises. In view of this duty on the part of county officers, the contract of the board of supervisors with the petitioners, in so far as it agreed to compensate them for furnishing information which it was the duty of the county officers to furnish, was unauthorized and void. With reference to such portions of the work performed by petitioners under their contract as were not by law required to be done by the various county officers, it is sufficient for the purposes of this case to say that, where a substantial part of the duties agreed by petitioners to be performed were contracted for in violation of the law, the contract being entire, the whole contract is void. Section 1608, Civ. Code; Humboldt County v. Stern, supra; Teachout v. Bogy, 175 Cal. 481, 486, 166 Pac. 319."

1. Sales ⊂=85(2)—Clause terminating contract in case of legislation interfering with business held not to include revenue act; "interfere."

A contract for the sale of the sellers' crops of grapes for three years to a manufacturer of wines which provided that it should be void in case of any prohibition or other legislative acts which in any way would interfere with the manufacture or shipments of the products of the buyer referred only to legislation placing a ban of some kind upon the manufacture, sale, or distribution of the buyer's products and did not include the War Revenue Act of October 22, 1914, increasing the tax on brandy used in the fortification of sweet wines so as to materially increase the cost of manufacture, but not imposing a tax so high as to naturally result in the discontinuance of the business; as "interfere" is a general phrase bearing the significance of disarrange, disturb, or hinder and must be limited in character by the preceding specific term "prohibition."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Interfere—Interference.]

2. Sales ⊂=283—No breach of warranty of crop of grapes where owner of vineyard ratified contract.

There was no breach of warranty within Civ. Code, § 1765, under a contract for the sale of crops of grapes of a specified vineyard, though the mother of one of the sellers was the owner of the vineyard, where it was her son's custom to transact all of her business as though it were his own, and she received a part of the proceeds with knowledge of the transactions, as she thereby ratified the contract.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Lewis R. Works, Judge.

Action by A. H. Conger and another against the Italian Vineyard Company. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Reversed.

Kennicott & Williams, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

O'Melveny, Millikin & Tuller, Roy V. Reppy, and Hewlings Mumper, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LENNON, J. On or about the 4th day of May, 1914, plaintiffs and defendant entered into a written agreement which is the subject of this suit. By the terms of this contract plaintiffs agreed to sell and deliver to defendant, a corporation engaged in the manufacture and shipment of wines, and defendant agreed to buy at a specified price, the entire crop of grapes to be grown on a certain vineyard in Riverside county, Cal., during the years 1914, 1915, and 1916. The crop of grapes grown in 1914 was delivered and paid for in accordance with the terms of the contract. On June 28, 1915, however, defendant wrote plaintiffs that the "War Revenue Act" of October 22, 1914 (38 Stat. 745), had so increased the tax on brandy used in the fortification of sweet wines as to make it necessary for defendant to cancel the contract for the purchase of the grapes. To this attempted termination of the contract plaintiffs interposed objection, claiming that the reason assigned by defendant was an insufficient ground for cancellation. The crop of 1915 was actually delivered by plaintiffs and accepted by defendant, but at a price less than that called for in said agreement. This was done under a special agreement, designed to save both parties from unnecessary loss, and upon the express stipulation that neither party receded from its position as to the force and effect of the contract of May, 1914. Defendant refused to accept delivery of the crop of 1916, whereupon plaintiffs sold the said crop for the highest obtainable price at the nearest available market, and brought this action for damages resulting from the sales of the crops of 1915 and 1916 at prices less than the contract price and for special damages growing out of the necessity of delivering the 1916 crop at a market more distant than the place of delivery agreed upon in said contract. Plaintiffs appeal from the judgment of the trial court, which was in favor of defendant.

[1] The following clause in the contract is the source of the main controversy in the case:

"It is further understood and agreed between the parties of the first part and the party of the second part that in case of any prohibition or other legislative acts, enacted either in the United States, the state of California, or San Bernardino county, which in any way will interfere with the manufacture or shipments of the products of the party of the second part, that this contract will then become null and void."

The legislation by which defendant claims the contract in question was terminated, under the clause of the contract above set forth, increased the tax upon brandy used in fortifying sweet wines from 3 to 55 cents per gallon. "Fortification," it was testified, is a process commonly employed in the manufacture of sweet wines and consists in the addition of brandy for the purpose of conserving the natural sweetness of the grapes by arresting fermentation, and thus checking the transformation of the natural sugar contained in the grapes into alcohol, and preventing the wine from becoming a "dry" wine. There was uncontradicted testimony that by this legislation, raising the tax upon the brandy used in fortifying sweet wines from 3 to 55 cents per gallon, defendant's cost of manufacturing sweet wines, with grapes at the contract price, was increased from $.22685 to $.35875 per gallon—i. e., over 13 cents.

Plaintiffs contend that the clause of the contract above quoted refers only to legislation of a prohibitory nature, aimed directly at forbidding, checking or impairing in whole or in part, the manufacture or shipments of wines and other beverages of alcoholic content, and does not permit a reliance upon a revenue act in justification of a refusal to proceed under the contract. It is thus evident that the point of divergence in the case is the meaning of the words "any prohibition or other legislative acts * * * which in any way will interfere with the manufacture or shipments of the products of the party of the second part." In aid of interpretation plaintiffs invoke the rule that, in the construction of statutes, wills, and other instruments "general words following an enumeration of specific things are usually restricted to things of the same kind (ejusdem generis) as those specifically enumerated." Bouvier's Law Dictionary. It is therefore urged that, notwithstanding the general language, the clause in question provides for a termination of the contract only in the event of the enactment of legislation of a prohibitive character. Defendant's answer to this contention is that the rule invoked is not an inflexible rule of interpretation, but merely an aid to interpretation when the meaning is not otherwise clear. Emery & Co. v. American Ins. Co., 177 Iowa, 4, 17, 158 N. W. 748. Defendant claims that the rule is inapplicable to the present case for the reason that the phrase "other legislative acts which in any way will interfere" renders it apparent that a larger object was in the minds of the parties than indicated by the preceding specific term "prohibition." The very generality of this phrase, however, is the most potent reason for the application of the rule relied upon by the plaintiffs.

Considered in its broadest aspect, the term "interfere" bears the significance of "disarrange," "disturb," "hinder." It will also be observed that, by reason of the use of the future tense, the parties were not obliged to await the actual results of the legislation before terminating the contract, for the contract ceases upon the enactment of legislation which "will" interfere. Consequently, unless the general phrase is limited in character by the preceding specific term "prohibition," the contract becomes inoperative upon the enactment of any law which can reasonably be said to be of such a nature that it is likely in the future to disturb in any way the manufacture or shipments of defendant's products. To carry this interpretation to its logical conclusion, any federal, state, or local legislation affecting freight rates, hours or compensation of labor, regulation as to sanitation, or lowering of importation or tariff rates might be interposed as an interference with the business in question quite as much as this increase in revenue taxation. If the parties contemplated such a general and far-reaching operation of the clause under consideration, it was incumbent upon them to clearly express that intention. Such unusual elasticity cannot be assumed from the vague expression used; it must be clearly provided for. The only reasonable assumption is that the parties had in mind legislation placing a ban of some kind upon the manufacture, sale, or distribution of the products of defendant. In this connection it was natural for them to employ terms of more general import than the single word "prohibition"; for, at the time the contract was entered into, manifold measures were under consideration having for their purpose the prevention of the manufacture or sale of beverages of alcoholic content. It would have been difficult for the parties to designate the multiplicity of methods thus proposed by a single concrete term, and, as a natural consequence, they sought to cover these varied prohibition measures by a general phrase.

It may be that, were the tax imposed so high as to naturally result in the discontinuance of defendant's business, it would be within the field of prohibitory legislation contracted against. However, that was not the nature of the particular act here under consideration. From all that appears, it was purely a revenue measure, and the evidence discloses that defendant produced a greater quantity of sweet wine after the passage of this act than before. Defendant's refusal to proceed with the purchase of the grapes is not, therefore, justified by the clause of the contract above set forth.

[2] Defendant also relies upon an alleged breach of warranty by the plaintiffs as a defense. Section 1765 of the Civil Code provides that—

"One who sells or agrees to sell personal property, as his own, thereby warrants that he has a good and unincumbered title thereto."

Cynthia Conger, the mother of plaintiff A. H. Conger, was the owner of the vineyard upon which the grapes were grown, and it is therefore claimed that there was a breach of warranty of title. There is no merit in this contention; it was not assigned as one of the reasons for declining to proceed with the contract in defendant's notice to plaintiffs in 1915. The evidence shows that it was the custom of plaintiff A. H. Conger to transact all of his mother's business as though it were his own. It was found by the court, upon sufficient evidence, that "the proceeds of the crops of 1914, 1915, and 1916, so far as received by the plaintiff A. H. Conger, were paid over by him to said Cynthia L. Conger and were accepted by her with the knowledge that the said crops had been delivered to the defendant and to Garrett & Co. [purchaser of the 1916 crop] by the plaintiff Herbert Hill, and that said Herbert Hill had received two-thirds of the proceeds thereof." It was further found that Cynthia L. Conger has never claimed any title to any of said grapes as against the persons to whom they were delivered. It therefore affirmatively appears that the contract was ratified by the owner of the grapes, and that the title promised defendant was not lacking.

The judgment is reversed.

In re MACHADO'S ESTATE.

MACHADO v. MACHADO

(two cases).

186 Cal. 246 (Sac. 3045, 3077.)

1. Executors and administrators ⊜77—Court properly refused to allow administrator credit for money advanced to widow.

On final accounting, court properly refused to allow administrator credit for a sum paid to the widow of deceased by him prior to his appointment as administrator, and long before any family allowance was authorized, and properly relegated the claimant to other remedies.

2. Executors and administrators ⊜491—Administrators held not entitled to commissions under agreement with widow.

Court properly denied claim of administrator for an allowance by way of commissions where he contracted with widow that he would charge no fees, in view of the fact that she subsequently waived her right to administer.

3. Executors and administrators ⊜111(1)—Allowance for attorney's fees in sound discretion of court.

The matter of attorney's fees to be allowed administrator on final accounting rests in the sound discretion of the court.

4. Executors and administrators ⊜278—Allowance properly made administrator for amount paid on unverified claim.

Court did not err in allowing administrator on final account for sum paid on notes held against the deceased, although no verified or other claim was ever presented to the administrator by the holder of the notes, or by any one in its behalf, there being no doubt but what the claim was justly due, and was paid in good faith, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1632.

5. Executors and administrators ⊜77—Allowance made administrator for money expended before appointment.

Court did not err in allowing administrator on final account money expended by him before his appointment in payment of claim against the estate, where, at the time of making the payment, there existed practically no doubt that in a few days he would be appointed administrator, being for the best interest of the estate that the obligation should be liquidated without delay.

6. Executors and administrators ⊜507(2)—Findings unnecessary on settlement of account.

On the settlement of an account of an executor or administrator, findings are not necessary, and an order settling an account need not be supported by a finding, there being implied in support of the order a finding of any facts necessary to sustain it, unless such implied finding is not supported by the evidence.

7. Partnership ⊜251 — Partnership debt rejected from administrator's account should be admitted to partnership account.

Where administrator settled partnership account in the course of his administration of his partner's estate, and submitted the partnership account with the administrator's account, if a payment for which allowance was sought in the administrator's account was rejected as being payment of a partnership debt, it should have been admitted to the partnership account.

8. Executors and administrators ⊜510(12)—Decree allowing final account may be corrected.

When a decree allowing a final account of an administrator is found to be erroneous as to an item or items, the Supreme Court on appeal may direct the decree to be corrected, and as corrected affirmed.

Appeals from Superior Court, Butte County; H. D. Gregory, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of Manuel S. Machado, deceased, of which F. A. Machado is administrator. From orders settling account, Rosie R. Machado, individually and as guardian of the children of deceased, and the administrator, respectively, appeal. Modified and affirmed.

J. Oscar Goldstein, of Chico, for Rosie R. Machado.

Jordan & Brann, of San Francisco, and F. I. Lemos, of Heyward, for F. A. Machado.

OLNEY, J. This appeal was first heard by the District Court of Appeal for the Third District, and after decision by it transferred to this court. In deciding the case the District Court of Appeal handed down an opinion, written by Judge Prewett, very concisely and satisfactorily disposing of most of the questions involved. That opinion, with the exception of the direction for reversal of the order appealed from, is as follows:

"In the matter of this estate there are two appeals. One is by the administrator and the other by the widow. The administrator was appointed as such upon the waiver and consent of the widow. He agreed to serve without compensation. Differences having arisen between the parties, he tendered his resignation. This resignation was tendered after the trial court had intimated the existence of sufficient grounds for his removal. He filed his final account, and these two appeals are the result of the action of the trial court in allowing and rejecting items therein contained.

"The rulings on 10 items are assigned as error; but as to most of them the action of the trial court is so clearly right that they may be disposed of in a few words.

[1] "(1) The court refused to allow the adminstrator credit for the sum of $725 paid to the widow by him prior to his appointment as administrator and long before any family allowance was authorized. The court properly held that this advancement was not by way of family allowance, and relegated the claimant to other remedies.

"(2) The administrator claims the sum of $236, paid by him for a lot in a cemetery near San Francisco for the burial of the body of the deceased. The court properly held that this lot was purchased by the administrator for his own purposes, and that some of his family are buried therein. The widow testified that she was not consulted about the matter, and that she intends to remove the body of her husband to the county of Butte, where she resides.

"(3) The administrator claims $115 which he paid out for automobiles for the use of guests in attending the funeral. However, this item is not included in the account, it is not made the subject of a finding, and the court neither allowed nor rejected it.

"(4) The administrator insists that he paid a claim of the Butte City National Bank of Chico in the sum of $1,531.65, for which payment he should receive credit. However, it was found by the court upon competent evidence that the payment was not made by the claimant, but by the copartnership of which deceased was in his lifetime a member. Moreover, the payment was made without the presentation of any claim therefor, and the court has not found that the same was justly due, and was paid in good faith. The claim was properly rejected.

"(5) The claim of the administrator for $75 paid to an accountant was rejected by the court upon the ground that the accountant was hired and paid by the partnership. There appears to be no error in this.

[2] "(6) The court denied the claim of the administrator for an allowance by way of administrator's commissions. The court found, and the evidence justifies the finding, that he contracted with the widow that he would charge no fees. This, in view of the fact that she subsequently waived her right to administer, justified the court in refusing to allow the claim.

[3] "(7) The court allowed only one-half the computed attorney's fees to the administrator. The matter rested in the sound discretion of the court. The estate was not wholly administered by the claimant, and it was proper for the court to divide the fees. Neither party is here insisting that the court should have delayed this matter until the close of the administration. We think the court did not abuse its discretion.

[4] "(8) The most important item involved in this appeal is the claim of the administrator for the allowance to him of the sum of $12,509.32 paid on notes held against the deceased by the Gianella Land Company. He paid this sum on February 11, 1918—about two months after the entry of the order appointing him as administrator. No verified or other claim was ever presented to the administrator by said land company, or by any one in its behalf. The court found that this claim was justly due; that it was paid in good faith; that the amount paid was the true amount over and above all set-offs or payments; and that the estate was solvent. These findings are fully supported by the evidence, and these facts were proven to the satisfaction of the court. This method of handling an estate is not to be commended, and the court should scrutinize such transactions with great care. But in this case there seems to be no doubt of the facts, and under the provisions of section 1632 of the Code of Civil Procedure the claim was properly allowed. In a thoroughly clear case the law tolerates such payments.

[5] "(9) There was allowed to the administrator credit for a payment of $1,500 to the Portuguese-American Bank, under circumstances precisely similar to the foregoing, save in one particular. This payment was made on December 21, 1917, being four days subsequent to the date of filing his petition for letters of administration. Whether a payment could be allowed when made by a stranger to the administration, and before he had become connected therewith, need not be at this time determined, although some California authorities incline to their allowance. In re Galland's Estate, 92 Cal. 293, [28 Pac. 287]. In Estate of Heeney, 3 Cal. App. 553 [86 Pac. 842], this court uses the following language: 'One thing is certain, and that is that the law does not contemplate that the claims of an administrator for reimbursement for moneys expended before his appointment can be established by his uncontradicted evidence.' But in the instant case the petitioner had already filed his petition, and the widow had consented in writing to his appointment. At the time of making the payment there existed practically no doubt that in a few days he would be appointed. The estate was paying interest on the amount, and it was clearly for the best interest of the estate that the obligation should be liquidated without delay. Under these circumstances we find no embarrassment in holding that the appointment subsequently made related back, for the purposes of this payment, to the date of filing the petition for letters. This view finds support in 11 R. C. L. p. 464, where we read: 'In effect the subsequent granting of letters of administration relates back to the death of the intestate, and makes valid acts which otherwise would or might have been tortious.' This payment was properly allowed.

"(10) The last of the disputed items is the sum of $2,464.51 paid by the administrator in liquidation of a note to A. S. Quartos. The item was paid on March 11, 1918, and the court allowed the administrator credit for it in his account. The attorney who drafted the findings for the court omitted therefrom any reference to this claim. We find in the record therefor no determination by the court that the amount was justly due; that it was paid in good faith; and that the amount paid was the true amount over and above all set-offs. That this was an oversight we are assured, from the fact that the court allowed the credit, and that both parties in their briefs take it for granted that the proper findings had been made. Under this state of the record it seems that we have no alternative save to set aside its allowance."

[6] The foregoing opinion is adopted as the opinion of this court, except as to the conclusions reached by it with respect to the items discussed under Nos. 4 and 10. Taking up the latter item for discussion first, it will be noted that the District Court of Appeal concluded that the allowance of this item had to be set aside because there was no finding to support it. This conclusion was based, of course, upon the assumption that a finding was necessary, an assumption which in justice to the court we should say was apparently concurred in by the parties. But on the settlement of an account of an executor or administrator findings are not necessary. This has been repeatedly held. See Estate of McPhee, 156 Cal. 335, 104 Pac. 455, Ann. Cas. 1913E, 899, and cases there cited. This being the law, the fact that the order settling the account is not supported by a finding as to this item is immaterial. There is implied in support of the order a finding of any facts necessary to sustain it, and unless such implied finding is not supported by the evidence the order must stand. There was evidence sufficient to support a finding that the amount paid by the administrator was paid in discharge of a valid debt justly due from the decedent, was the true amount of such indebtedness over and above all offsets, and was paid in good faith. This being the case, the allowance of this item must stand.

[7] As to the item discussed under No. 4, it will be noted that the probate court disallowed it on the ground that it was the payment, not of a debt of the decedent, but of the partnership of which the decedent was a member, having a three-fifths interest. The administrator settled the partnership accounts in the course of his administration of the estate, and submitted the partnership account with his administrator's account, and charged himself in the latter account with the decedent's share of the balance shown by the partnership account. Now it is evident that if the payment in question was one of a partnership debt, and was rejected for that reason from the administrator's account, it should have entered into the partnership account, and, entering there, it would reduce the balance shown by that account, and proportionately reduce the amount chargeable against the administrator as the share of the estate in the partnership balance. In other words, the situation was that the payment should have come into one account or the other. If it was the payment of an individual debt of the decedent, it should have come into the account of the administrator. If it was the payment of a debt of the partnership, it should have come into the partnership account, and in that manner the decedent's share of the debt—three-fifths—have finally come into the administrator's account. The probate court found that the payment was of a partnership debt, and rejected it from the administrator's account. But when the court did this, it followed as a necessary consequence that the payment should have been admitted to the partnership account, unless it were already there. We have examined that account, and it is not there. It follows that it should have been admitted there. Its admission there would, of course, mean that finally the administrator would be charged in his account with an amount less than that with which he was charged by three-fifths of the payment, the decedent's share of the partnership debt. Three-fifths of the payment is $918.99.

[8] There is no necessity for reversing the order in order to allow the administrator this amount. As was said in Estate of Adams, 131 Cal. 415, 420, 63 Pac. 838, 840:

"When the decree allowing a final account is found to be erroneous as to an item or items, this court may direct the decree to be corrected, and as corrected affirm it."

The order appealed from is modified by substituting for the sum of $7,467.05, with which the appellant F. A. Machado is adjudged to be chargeable, and which he is directed to pay over to Rosie R. Machado Costa, as administratrix, the sum of $6,548.06, and as so modified the order is affirmed, the appellant F. A. Machado to recover costs.

MERCURY AVIATION CO. v. INDUSTRIAL ACC. COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al. (L. A. 6780.)

1. Master and servant ⟸385(11)—Compensation allowable though employee returned to work at same wages.

A master cannot escape liability for compensation for permanent partial disability under the Workmen's Compensation Act because the employee, before expiration of the period covered by payments, returned to work and received the same compensation as before.

2. Master and servant ⟸385(17)—Compensation may be allowed without deductions for voluntary payments of wages.

Though an employer for five weeks during the time servant was totally incapacitated paid him full compensation, and thereafter, notwithstanding the servant's partial disability, continued him at the same scale of wages as before the accident, the employer is not as a matter of law entitled to have such voluntary payments deducted from the amount for which it was liable, Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act, § 11g, declaring that the Commission may take such payments into consideration, and hence, where the Commission merely allowed the employer credit for full payment of wages during the first period of five weeks' disability, the employer cannot complain.

3. Master and servant ⟸385(17)—Allowance of credit for voluntary payments to compensation claimant discretionary.

Under Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act, § 11g, allowance of credit to the employer for sums voluntarily paid to the injured employee is a matter resting in the discretion of the Industrial Accident Commission.

Shaw and Olney, JJ., dissenting.

In Bank.

Application by the Mercury Aviation Company for a writ of certiorari to review an order of the Industrial Accident Commission awarding compensation to George C. Freeman under the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act for personal injuries. Award affirmed.

Neil S. McCarthy, Herbert Freston, and James, Smith & McCarthy, all of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

A. E. Graupner, of San Francisco, for respondents.

LENNON, J. The award of the Industrial Accident Commission here under review is based upon the following facts: On October 9, 1919, George C. Freeman, employed by the Mercury Aviation Company as a mechanic, received an injury to his right arm while cranking an airplane motor in the course of employment. After an interval of five weeks during which he was totally disabled, the employee resumed work with the Mercury Aviation Company, but because of his injury was unable to continue his duties as a mechanic and performed only "light work." From the date of his injury in October, 1919, until April, 1920, when he was discharged from employment, the Mercury Aviation Company continued to pay the employee the sum of $35 per week, which was the full amount of his actual weekly earnings at the time he was injured. After his discharge from employment the employee applied to the Industrial Accident Commission for an adjustment of his compensation claim against the employer. The Commission rated his disability as 11½ per cent. permanent and fixed his compensation at $20.83 a week for forty-six weeks, amounting to a total of $958.18. The Commission allowed the employer a credit of $83.32 for the payment of $20.83 per week during four weeks of the five-week period of total disability, and made an award of $874.86 in favor of the applicant, George C. Freeman. The Mercury Aviation Company petitioned this court for a writ of review, claiming that a larger credit should have been allowed on account of the 100 per cent. weekly payments which it made to the employee continuously from the date of the injury until the time of his discharge.

[1-3] An employer cannot escape the payment of compensation for a permanent partial disability solely upon the ground that the employee returned to work prior to the termination of the period covered by the payments and for the same wages received by him before the injury. Frankfort Gen. Ins. Co. v. Pillsbury, 173 Cal. 56, 159 Pac. 150; Gabriel v. Northwestern P. R. R., 2 I. A. C. 166. It is claimed, however, that, in-as-much as the employee did not in fact earn the full weekly payments received by him after the impairment to his arm, these sums, or at least some considerable portion thereof, were not paid in return for labor and must be regarded as payments of compensation due under the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act.

Subdivision "g" of section 11 of the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance, and Safety Act of 1917, Stats. 1917, pp. 831, 842, provides:

"Any payment, allowance or benefit received by the injured employee during the period of his incapacity * * * which by the terms of this act was not then due and payable * * * shall not, in the absence of any agreement, be construed to be an admission of liability for compensation on the part of the employer, or the acceptance thereof as a waiver of any right or claim which the employee or his dependents may have against the employer, but any such payment, allowance or benefit may be taken into account by the commission in fixing the amount of the compensation to be paid."

Conceding, then, that the record in the present case shows that the $35 weekly payments exceeded the actual value of the services rendered by the employee subsequent to his injury, nevertheless the employer cannot insist upon a credit for any sums paid as pure gratuities from benevolent motives and not paid and accepted with the understanding that they constituted payments of compensation under the provisions of the Workmen's Compensation Act. Blackford v. Green, 87 N. J. Law, 359, 94 Atl. 401, affirmed 89 N. J. Law, 357, 100 Atl. 1069. Under the provisions of section 11, subd. "g," of the Workmen's Compensation Act of 1917, quoted above, where payments have been made by the employer during the period of incapacity without any agreement between the parties as to the application of the same, the Commission may take the voluntary payments into consideration to the extent that it sees fit in fixing the amount of compensation, but the employer cannot complain if the Commission declines to make deductions on account of such payments. In the instant case it is admitted that there was no express agreement that the payments were made in discharge of any legal liability of the employer. The petitioner elected to pay $35 a week for the five weeks during which the employee was totally incapacitated, although the liability imposed by the act was only $20.83 for four weeks of that period. The reemployment of the injured employee was entirely optional with petitioner, just as it was optional with the employee to continue working, and likewise the amount of wages was a matter for the determination of the parties. Inasmuch as petitioner chose to continue full payments during the period of total disability in the absence of any agreement, and thereafter to accept services from the employee and make regular payments to him without any understanding that the services rendered were not worth the sums paid and that some portion thereof was paid as compensation, it is not entitled, as a matter of legal right, to insist upon the deduction of the payments from the amount of the award. De Zeng Standard Co. v. Pressey, 86 N. J. Law, 469, 92 Atl. 278, affirmed 88 N. J. Law, 382, 96 Atl. 1102.

The extent to which the payments should be considered, if at all, was entirely in the discretion of the Commission. It was logical for the Commission to deduct the amount of compensation payable during the period of total disability to offset the payments made by the employer when it received no return whatever from the employee. There was no abuse of discretion in the refusal of the Commission to credit the employer with the amount by which payments actually made during the period of total disability exceeded the payments called for by the act, nor in refusing to make any allowance for payments made after the employee returned to work.

The award is affirmed.

SHAW, J. I dissent. I am not able to see why, in reason and justice, the voluntary payments by the employer to the employee on account of his injury should not be set off against the forced contribution imposed by the law on the employer for his benefit. Such kindness should rather be encouraged than discouraged.

PHILLIPS v. STARK et al. (L. A. 6578.)

1. Sales ⟸340—Vendor's election, on vendee's repudiation, to sue for difference between contract price and sum realized on resale, does not preclude recovery of damages instead of contract price.

Under Civ. Code, § 3310, providing that, where title to personal property has passed to a vendee, the detriment caused by his refusal to pay therefor is deemed to be the contract price, the fact that a seller of a bakery, after recovery of possession on the buyer's refusal to pay for it, sued, not for the contract price, but for the difference between it and the sum realized on a resale of the property, did not preclude the court from according him the measure of damages to which he was entitled, the statute not dealing with the vendor's remedy, but with the measure of damages to which he is entitled, if entitled to such remedy.

2. Sales ⟸92—Retaking possession and resale by vendor, on repudiation by vendee, not rescission, though title passed to vendee.

Where the purchasers of a bakery, after delivery of possession, refused to pay, repudiated the contract, and abandoned the property, the seller's act in retaking possession of and reselling it did not indicate any acquiescence in such repudiation or any intent to end the sale, so as to constitute a rescission, he not being required to leave the property without protection, though title had passed to the purchasers.

3. Sales ⟸384(7)—Vendor, on retaking possession and reselling, on breach of vendee's contract to buy, may recover difference between contract price and market value.

Though Civ. Code, § 3310, provides that, where the title to personal property has passed to a vendee, the detriment caused by the latter's refusal to pay for it is deemed to be the contract price, where the seller of a bakery, on the purchasers' repudiation of the contract, retook possession and resold the property, though title had passed by delivery to the purchasers, the value of the property must be offset against the purchase price, whether on the theory that by repudiating the contract and thrusting the property back on the seller the purchaser put him in the situation of a vendor under an executory contract, in which case the measure of damages is the difference between the contract price and the market value of the property (Civ. Code, §§ 3311, 3353), or on the theory that the vendee is responsible for the full purchase price (Civ. Code, § 3310), but the vendor is liable to the vendee in damages for a conversion, the result being the same in either case, since the measure of damages for a conversion is the market value of the property, under Civ. Code, § 3337.

4. Sales ⟸377 — Allegation of amount for which property resold by vendor on vendee's breach of contract to buy insufficient allegation of market value, difference between which and contract price was measure of damages.

The complaint of a vendor of a bakery suing the vendee for damages for the latter's breach of contract in refusing to pay therefor and repudiating the contract, whereupon the vendor retook possession and resold the property, was defective in not alleging the market value of the property, the difference between which and the contract price was the measure of damages; the allegation of the amount for which it sold on resale being of an evidentiary fact only, not an ultimate fact.

5. Appeal and error ⟸193(1) — Judgment against plaintiff not sustained because of defect in complaint of which no point made by defendant.

A judgment against a plaintiff will not be sustained by reason of a defect in his complaint where no point was made of such defect by defendant.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. P. Wood, Judge.

Action by A. Phillips against B. Stark and another. From a judgment of nonsuit, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Lester Wm. Roth, of Los Angeles (Janeway, Beach & Pratt, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellant.

E. F. Gerecht, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

OLNEY, J. This is an appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment of nonsuit. The plaintiff's evidence was in substantial accord with the allegations of his complaint and was to the following effect:

The plaintiff was the owner of a bakery and sold it to the defendants for the price of $10,000. The defendants at the time gave the plaintiff a check for $500 on account, agreed to pay the balance the next day, and received immediate possession. The next day the plaintiff called upon the defendants to obtain the balance of $9,500, and in the course of the interview was tricked into giving them temporary possession of the check for $500. As soon as they got the check, the defendants tore it up, refused to pay anything on the purchase price, and told the plaintiff that the sale was off; that they would have nothing to do with the property, and he could do with it as he pleased. The defendants then abandoned the bakery, and the plaintiff retook possession and sold it at public auction, but without giving the notice to the defendants required by the Code for a sale in enforcement of a vendor's lien. Sections 3049 and 3002, Civ. Code. Upon these facts the plaintiff sought to recover the difference between the contract price of $10,000 and the amount realized on the auction sale, some $6,000.

[1] The delivery of possession to the defendants, of course, operated to pass title, there being nothing to indicate a contrary intent. The case was, then, one where the vendees of personal property, the title to which had vested in them, refused to pay for the property. It therefore came directly within the language of section 3310, Civil Code, providing that, where the title to personal property has passed to a vendee, the detriment caused by his refusal to pay for the property is deemed to be the contract price. Because the case does come within this Code section, and because the plaintiff sued, not for the contract price, but for the difference between it and the sum realized on the auction sale, it is claimed that the plaintiff has elected to pursue a remedy to which he is not entitled. Upon this ground the nonsuit was asked and granted.

But a consideration of the case and of the Code section shows immediately two things: First, that a contract of sale was made and broken by the defendants, and that therefore the plaintiff has a cause of action for damages against them unless in some way he has lost it; and, second, that the Code section is not dealing with the remedy, using the word in its true sense, to which the vendor may be entitled, but with the measure of the damages to which he is entitled, if he is entitled to the remedy of damages. There is, of course, a marked difference between a plaintiff being entitled to a certain measure of damages and his being entitled to damages at all. It is very possible for a party to a contract broken by the other party to it to make such an election of remedies as to preclude him from thereafter seeking and obtaining the remedy of damages, but, if he has not made such an election and is entitled to damages, the fact that he seeks damages according to a wrong measure is almost wholly inconsequential, and does not preclude the court from according him the damages to which he is entitled according to their true measure. This is clearly evident in the present case when we consider that the defendants' contention, as they put it, really amounts to but this, that the plaintiff should have sued them for $10,000, the contract price, instead of for but $4,000, the difference between the contract price and the sum realized from the auction sale. The defendants certainly cannot complain because they have been sued for too little, and the plaintiff should certainly not be nonsuited upon any such ground.

[2] The foregoing discussion is of the defendants' contention on its face as it is presented. As such, it is very easily disposed of as not involving any question of an election of remedies at all. There lies behind it, however, a real question as to an election of remedies, quite different from the contention as presented, but which we believe the contention was intended to present. That question is: Did the plaintiff by his acts in retaking possession of the property and reselling it make such an election of the remedies he might pursue for the defendants' breach of contract as thereafter to preclude him from pursuing that of a recovery of damages. This is the real question presented by the facts of the case, and we may take it that it is raised by the defendants. To its consideration we pass.

One of the remedies to which the plaintiff was entitled upon the defendants' repudiation and consequent breach of the contract was that of rescission, and, if he chose to avail himself of this remedy, he could not thereafter seek and obtain the different and wholly inconsistent remedy of damages. On the other hand, we think it evident that, unless the contract was rescinded, the plaintiff is entitled to the remedy of damages, since the contract still stands and its breach appears. The question then is: Did either of the two acts of the plaintiff, that of retaking possession or that of reselling the property, amount to a rescission, or, putting it in another way, was either of them inconsistent in any manner with the plaintiff still insisting upon the continuance in effect of the contract and his right to recover for its breach.

As to the retaking of possession, if the plaintiff had done so under such circumstances as to show an acquiescence on his part in the position taken by the defendants that the sale was off, there would at once have been a rescission by mutual consent. It might also be (we express no opinion upon the point) that if, upon the defendants' refusal to pay, the plaintiff had insisted on retaking possession from them without any abandonment of possession on their part, his act in so doing would be taken to manifest an intention on his part to end the sale then and there, and to amount to a rescission. But when the defendants not only refused to pay, but repudiated the contract and abandoned the property, the plaintiff's act in retaking possession of it certainly cannot be said to indicate any acquiescence on his part in the repudiation or any intent to end the sale. Whether he intended to insist upon the contract or not, the only sensible thing for him to do was to retake possession. He either had to do so for the protection of the property or allow it to be lost or destroyed for want of protection. He could, of course, have left it to its fate, but he was not required to follow any such hazardous and unreasonable course. The defendants thrust the necessity of taking possession upon him, and very plainly against his will, and without any thought on his part of acquiescing in their repudiation or himself terminating the contract of sale. Under these circumstances, there was no rescission.

For much the same reasons, the second act of the plaintiff, that of reselling the property, did not amount to a rescission. The defendants had repudiated the contract and abandoned the property. The plaintiff had it on his hands. Was he, in spite of the defendants' absolute and unequivocal repudiation of the contract, to be required to hold it for them indefinitely under penalty of otherwise acquiescing in their repudiation and losing any right of recovery against them? That question has been answered in this state in cases exactly similar except for the fact that title to the property had not passed to the vendee. It has been held a number of times that a resale by a vendor whose vendee has repudiated the contract does not work a rescission. See Tomboy, etc., Co. v. Marks, 197 Pac. 94, and cases there cited. Upon this point we can see no difference between them and such a case as the present where the title has passed before the repudiation, but the vendee by the repudiation has left the property upon the vendor's hands. The actual situation of the parties is exactly the same. The vendees wrongfully refuse to consummate the sale, and the vendor has the property on his hands. In fact, we see no reason why the plaintiff may not insist that the defendants, by thrusting the property back upon him and thereby undoing the delivery by reason of which title passed, have in effect estopped themselves from claiming that their rights are any different than they would have been if the delivery had not been made.

Reliance is placed by the defendants upon the authority of Bennett v. Potter, 16 Cal. App. 183, 116 Pac. 681. The facts of that case upon the point under discussion were identical with those now presented; that is, it was a case where a vendor, left with property on his hands the title to which had passed to the vendee, resold the property, but not in the manner required for the enforcement of a vendor's lien, and brought suit for the difference between the contract price and the amount obtained on the resale. But, while there is no difference in the facts, there is a decided difference in the action which the court took upon the facts. The plaintiff was not nonsuited nor refused any recovery, but quite the contrary. In Bennett v. Potter the trial court had allowed the plaintiff judgment for the difference between the contract price and the amount realized on the resale. This was reversed on appeal, but not on the ground that the plaintiff was not entitled to recover anything. It was reversed on the ground that, since the resale had not been made in the manner prescribed for the enforcement of a vendor's lien, the defendant was not bound by it, that as a result the plaintiff had been guilty of a conversion of the property for which he was liable to the defendant, and that the amount received by the plaintiff on the resale could not be taken as the defendant's measure of damages for this conversion. It is not said in so many words, but the plain implication from the opinion is that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the contract price offset by the amount of damages done the defendant by the conversion worked by the resale. The decision, therefore, does not justify the nonsuit in the present case, but rather the contrary.

Our conclusion, then, is that neither of the acts of the plaintiff, which it might be claimed amounted to an election of remedies, did in fact do so, and that so far as the plaintiff's evidence shows he still has the right to recover in damages for the defendants' breach of the contract. This being the case, the order granting the nonsuit was erroneous, and the judgment based upon it must be reversed.

[3] Before dismissing the cause, however, there are two things which perhaps should be added. The first is in regard to the measure of the damages to which the plaintiff is entitled. The measure provided by section 3310, Civil Code, in cases where title has passed to the vendee, is the full purchase price. But this measure, of course, is based upon the assumption that because the title has passed, the property has gone from the vendor, and he has nothing but his claim against the vendee without any offsets. But where, as here, although the title has passed, the vendor still retains the property, the value of the property must be offset against the purchase price. The vendor may not have both the full purchase price and the property. It is quite immaterial in the present case upon what theory this is worked out, whether upon that suggested by us, that by repudiating the contract and thrusting the property back on the plaintiff the defendants put him in the situation of a vendor under an executory contract, in which case the measure of damages is the difference between the contract price and the market value of the property (sections 3311, 3353, Civ. Code), or upon that suggested by Bennett v. Potter, that the vendee is responsible for the full purchase price under section 3310, Civil Code, but the vendor is liable to the vendee in damages for a conversion. The result is the same in either case, since the measure of damages for a conversion is the market value of the property. Section 3337, Civ. Code.

[4, 5] The other thing that we would add is that the complaint is defective in not alleging the market value of the property. It does allege the amount for which it sold on the resale, and this was evidence of the market value (Meyer v. McAllister, 24 Cal. App. 16, 140 Pac. 42), but the allegation was only one of an evidentiary, and not of an ultimate, fact. No point was made of this defect, and it could easily have been cured if point had been made of it. The judgment against the plaintiff should not therefore be sustained by reason of it.

Judgment reversed, with leave to the parties to amend their pleadings, if they so desire.

3. Municipal corporations ⊂=475 — Board of supervisors' determination as to conditions on which assessment is made payable in annual installments conclusive, unless of no legitimate connection with payment of installments.

Whether the conditions upon which street improvement assessment was made payable in annual installments were reasonable and just within San Francisco City Charter, art. 6, c. 2, § 33, authorizing board of supervisors to make assessment exceeding one-half of the assessed value of the property payable in annual installments upon conditions deemed reasonable and just by such board, was a question primarily for the board itself, and the board's determination is conclusive unless the conditions have no legitimate connection with the regulation of the method and manner of the payment of the installments.

4. Municipal corporations ⟸488, 489(9)—Requirement that owner give bond waiving irregularities held not an unreasonable or unjust condition to payment of assessment in installments.

Requirement of resolution of intention in street improvement proceedings under street improvement ordinance, enacted pursuant to San Francisco City Charter, art. 6, c. 2, § 33, that owners sign bond waiving irregularities in the proceedings, held not unreasonable or unjust within such provision of the charter providing for payment of assessment exceeding one-half of the value of the assessed property in annual installments on conditions deemed reasonable and just by the board of supervisors, since such bond will have reference only to informalities and defects not jurisdictional, in view of the invalidity, for failure of consideration, of any bond given to secure privilege of paying assessment levied by authorities having no jurisdiction.

5. Municipal corporations ⟸475 — Requirement that interest on assessment installments be paid semiannually not violative of charter provision providing for interest "per annum."

Requirement that 7 per cent. interest on installments of street improvement assessment be paid semiannually held not violative of San Francisco City Charter, art. 6, c. 2, § 33, providing for payment of assessment exceeding one-half of assessed value of property, in annual installments, with deferred payments to bear interest at a rate not greater than 7 per cent. "per annum."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Per Annum.]

6. Municipal corporations ⟸560—Contractor may sue to recover entire assessment made payable in installments on owner's failure to execute bond.

Under Street Improvement Ordinance of City and County of San Francisco, § 35, authorizing contractor's suit to recover assessment in the event of a void or faulty bond, or owner's failure to give bond, and creating a lien on the property for the full amount of the assessment, the contractor could sue to recover entire amount of assessment, though it was made payable in annual installments, on owner's failure to execute a bond.

7. Appeal and error ⟸1170(3)—Failure to allege that ordinance pleaded was passed on certain date held not reversible error.

In action to recover street assessment, where complaint alleged that proceedings were had under conditions of ordinance specified by number, title, and date of passage, the failure to directly allege that the ordinance was passed on a certain date under Code Civ. Proc. § 459 held not reversible error under Const. art. 6, § 4½.

WILBUR, J. [1] Plaintiff seeks to recover upon a street assessment levied by the board of public works of the city and county of San Francisco for the improvement of Fifteenth avenue, between Fulton and Balboa streets. Plaintiff recovered judgment, and defendants appeal. The proceedings for the improvement of said street were had under the provisions of a street improvement ordinance enacted under the power conferred by section 33 of chapter 2, art. 6, of the Charter of San Francisco (Stats. 1911, p. 1691; Stats. 1913, pp. 1482, 1483, 1623), which ordinance is referred to in the case of Bienfield v. Van Ness, 176 Cal. 585, 169 Pac. 225, and will be hereafter referred to as the Street Improvement Ordinance. The assessment in question exceeded one-half of the value at which the said property was assessed, exclusive of improvements thereon, on the assessment book of San Francisco current at the date of the passage of the resolution of intention. Such an assessment is prohibited by subdivision 3, § 8, c. 2, art. 6, of the Charter of San Francisco, and was unauthorized and void (City Street Imp. Co. v. Pearson, 181 Cal. 640, 185 Pac. 962), unless provision was made in the proceedings for the payment of the assessment in annual installments, deferred payments bearing interest at a rate not greater than 7 per cent. per annum (section 33 supra; St. Imp. Ord., § 16).

By amendment to the charter, adopted in 1913 (article 6, c. 2, § 33, Stats. 1913, p. 1602), it was provided that the board of supervisors were authorized to provide in their street improvement ordinance for such payment in installments, the language of that section of the charter on that subject being as follows:

"* * * If said board deems it expedient, provision may be made for the payment of any assessment levied in pursuance of the provisions thereof in annual installments covering a term not to exceed ten years upon conditions as to said board may seem reasonable and just, the rate of interest to be paid on such payments not to exceed seven per cent. per annum. In any proceeding for the improvement of streets wherein provision is made for the payment of any assessment in annual installments, the amount of such assessment shall not be limited by the provisions contained in subdivision three of section 8 of this chapter."

Acting under this power, the board of supervisors in its street improvement ordinance provides that the payment of the assessment may be made in annual installments—

"whenever the board of public works shall so determine and declare in the resolution of intention, or whenever the board of supervisors shall so determine and declare in the ordinance ordering the work, and it shall be mandatory on the board of public works to so determine and declare in every case when the amount of the assessment imposed will exceed one-half of the assessed value of the lot or parcel of land against which such assessment is imposed. Such resolution or ordinance shall state the number of installments in which the assessment may be paid, and the rate of interest to be charged on all deferred payments, which rate of interest shall not exceed 7 per cent. per annum." Sec. 28, Street Imp. Ord. of San Francisco.

The petition for transfer to this court after decision in the District Court of Appeal, First Appellate District, was based upon the claim that the assessments were void because not payable in annual installments, and this contention was in turn based upon the proposition that such provision as was made for deferred payments of installments of the assessments was invalid because conflicting with the charter. The petition was granted because the effect of a failure to make provision for payment of annual installments was under consideration in the case of City Street Imp. Co. v. Pearson, supra, since decided.

After our decision of the case a rehearing was granted. We held that the provision in the street improvement ordinance with reference to the payment in annual installments was not a sufficient compliance with the duty imposed upon the supervisors by section 33, supra, to take the assessment out of the provision of section 8 of the same chapter, declaring such assessments to be void when in excess of one-half of the assessed value. Inasmuch as this decision invalidated every bond issued under the street improvement ordinance of San Francisco, where the amount of the assessment exceeded one-half of the assessed value of the lot (section 8, supra; City Street Imp. Co. v. Pearson, supra), a rehearing was granted to enable us to further consider the effect of that portion of section 33, supra, giving the board of supervisors power to fix the conditions for the payment of the annual installments. The clause particularly referred to is above set forth, and is as follows: "Upon conditions as to said board may seem reasonable and just. * * *" We will now proceed to a consideration of that question.

In its resolution of intention to perform the work for which the assessment herein was levied, the board of public works provided that such assessment should be paid in three annual installments, with 7 per cent. interest per annum on all deferred payments. The detailed provisions for such payment is contained in the street improvement ordinance. This ordinance makes no provision for an assessment payable in installments, but does provide that the owner may, by giving a writing, denominated a bond, for the payment of said street assessment, secure the privilege of paying the same in annual installments, the first installment being payable at the date of the delivery of the bond; the bond must be executed and filed in the office of the board of public works within 30 days from the date of the demand made upon the property holder, or, if an appeal is taken, within 20 days after decision on appeal. The form of the bond is set forth in the street improvement ordinance. It recites the proceedings instituted for the improvement of the particular street, acknowledges and admits the validity and regularity of such proceeding, and promises to pay to the contractor or order the assessment in the number of annual installments therein set forth, which installments, in time of payment and amount, were to correspond with the installments provided by the board of public works in its resolution of intention for the improvement of the particular street involved. In the event of the default in the payment of any installment or any interest, according to the terms of the bond all said installments of principal, and interest thereon, become immediately due and payable, and the board of public works is authorized to sell the property herein described and pay the amount so due, together with the expense of such sale, in accordance with the law for the sale of real property upon execution and after notice as therein provided for. The bond further provides:

"That a lien for the full amount of the sum obligated to be paid under this bond, principal, interest and costs, is hereby created and acknowledged upon, in and to the real property described herein and the improvements thereon and appurtenances thereto."

In the case at bar, to comply with street improvement ordinance and with the resolution of intention to improve Fifteenth avenue, the first installment of the assessment was to be paid at the time of delivery of the bond, the second one year, and the third two years thereafter, "together with interest on each assessment at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum" interest to be paid semiannually, six months from the date of the bond, and every six months thereafter. The appellants claim that the proceedings are invalid: First, because it is claimed the mandatory provisions of the charter and the ordinance requiring the assessment to be paid in annual installments are not complied with by the provision that the property holder may secure the privilege of paying in such annual installments by the execution of the bond in question; second, because the amount of interest on the deferred installments is limited by the charter (section 33, supra) and by the street improvement ordinance (section 28) to 7 per cent. per annum, and because the interest was required to be paid semiannually, and such requirement is, in effect, an increase of the rate above 7 per cent. per annum.

[2] Recurring to a consideration of the first point. The discretion of the board in enacting its ordinance is limited by the requirement that the installments shall be annual, and cover terms not to exceed 10 years, and bear interest not to exceed 7 per cent. per annum. The provisions for the payment of an assessment in three installments, one at the date of the delivery of the bond, the others in equal installments in one and two years, respectively, was a compliance with the requirement that the installments should be annual. The purpose of the enactment was to give the property holder more time in which to pay the larger amounts. Ordinarily the entire payment was made upon demand. By postponing two installments for one and two years, the purpose sought to be accomplished by the act was achieved.

[3] Was the requirement that the property holder sign a bond, waiving irregularities in the proceedings, unreasonable or unjust? In answering this question it is to be observed that we are dealing with the legislative power vested in the board of supervisors by the charter, and that it is primarily for their determination whether the provision made is reasonable and just. In this particular instance the charter expressly authorizes an assessment for more than 50 per cent. of the assessed value of the lot, when provision is made by the supervisors for the payment of the assessment in annual installments upon terms that they may determine to be reasonable and just. If the provision for the issuance of a bond may fairly be said to be incidental to the regulation of the payment by installments, then the determination of the supervisors is binding upon this court. If, however, such requirement has no legitimate connection with the regulation of the method and manner of paying in installments, then the determination by the board of supervisors that such a provision was reasonable and just would not be binding upon the court. In determining this question it is proper to observe that the Legislature of the state, in the Local Improvement Act of 1901 (Statutes 1901, pp. 34, 38, § 13), provided for a very similar written waiver on the part of the property holder, upon giving which the assessment for the improvement of a street was to be paid in installments. This provision is as follows:

"Sec. 13. * * * Provided, however, if at or before the time fixed in the notice of sale the owner of any parcel shall file with the tax collector a written agreement, waiving all objections, of whatsoever kind or nature, against the assessment and all proceedings with reference to the same, and undertaking to pay the assessment on his parcel in yearly installments not to exceed ten in number, the first of which shall be paid at the time said agreement is filed, and the others annually thereafter, one each year, at the time when the first installment of municipal taxes within said municipality is payable, with interest on all deferred payments at the rate of ——— per cent. per annum, being the same rate fixed by the resolution provided for in section five above for deferred payments, payable at the same time as the installments of principal, then, and in that event, the tax collector shall mark upon the record of the assessment, opposite the respective descriptions or numbers of such parcels, memoranda to the effect that time has been given; said waivers and undertakings shall be taken upon printed forms provided by the tax collector, bound in a substantial book and kept among the records of his office; said agreements shall contain a provision to the effect that in case of default in payment of any installment of principal provided for therein, or interest accrued on deferred payments, at the time called for by said agreements, then, in that event, the entire remaining unpaid installments shall become immediately due and payable, and the tax collector shall then forthwith, upon twelve days' written notice mailed to the last known address of the party, sell the property covered by the delinquent payment to realize the entire unpaid balance of said installments, with accrued interests and costs of sale; provided, the same have not been paid before the expiration of said twelve days. At such sale the municipality may be a bidder; said agreement shall provide that the entire unpaid balance may be paid at any time before maturity, together with interest on all deferred payments, until the date of maturity of the installment of principal next falling due."

The board of supervisors of San Francisco were expressly authorized by section 33, supra, of the charter to adopt this or any other state law for the improvement of streets in lieu of the charter plan for such improvement. That portion of the section referred to is as follows:

"Section 33. The method of procedure in this article * * * shall not be deemed exclusive, but the board of supervisors by an affirmative vote of not less than two-thirds of the members thereof, may by ordinance substitute therefor any method of procedure in any general law of the state of California now in force and effect, or as the same may be amended or that may hereafter be enacted, providing for any such improvements in municipalities, and levying assessments for the expense or portion thereof upon private property. * * *"

Then follows the portion of the section hereinabove quoted. The closing sentence, it will be observed, is as follows:

"In any proceeding for the improvement of streets wherein provision is made for the payment of any assessment in annual installments, the amount of such assessment shall not be limited by the provisions contained in subdivision 3 of section 8 of this charter."

If the board of supervisors of San Francisco had by ordinance adopted the Local Improvement Act of 1901, with the foregoing provisions in regard to the payment of the assessment in installments, would it be contended that the statutory scheme so adopted did not make provision for the payment of assessments in annual installments within the meaning of that expression as used in the concluding sentence of section 33? If the answer is "No," then it would follow that the making of a substantially identical provision in the street improvement ordinance of San Francisco was also a provision for the payment in annual installments. Indeed, the fact that such a plan was already on the statute books, and that the board of supervisors was expressly authorized to adopt that plan, would seem to indicate that this particular method of paying an assessment in annual installments was within the contemplation of the framers of the amendment to the charter, and of the Legislature in approving the same. Section 33 of the charter, supra, was under consideration by this court in Hayne v. San Francisco, 174 Cal. 185, 162 Pac. 625. In this case the court emphasized the fact that the power of the board of supervisors in adopting a procedural ordinance was to be construed in the light of its power to adopt state laws already in force for the making of similar improvements. In that connection the court made the following statement (174 Cal. 191, 162 Pac. 628):

"Section 33, above quoted, authorizes the supervisors to adopt the procedure prescribed in article 6 of the charter, or 'any method of procedure in any general law of the state,' or to enact an ordinance prescribing a procedure. There were and are in force several statutes providing for the making and collection of assessments to defray the expenses of similar public work in advance of the construction thereof, namely, the act of 1889, the act of 1893, and the act of 1903, each providing a mode for the opening of public streets through private lands (Stats. 1889, p. 70; Stats. 1893, p. 220; Stats. 1903, p. 376); the act of 1901 and the act of 1909, each for the improvement of public streets (Stats. 1901, p. 34; Stats. 1909, p. 1042); and the acts of 1891 and 1893 for changing the grades of streets and for doing the necessary work for that purpose (Stats. 1891, p. 116; Stats. 1893, p. 91). The act of 1901 provides that the assessment for the costs and expenses must be collected before the contract is let for the work to be done. Therefore, when the board of supervisors, by the same section, is empowered to enact a procedure as a substitute for these various modes, the implied meaning of the latter grant is that such ordinance may also provide for the collection of the assessment before the doing of the work, or the letting of a contract therefor."

If the fact that the act of 1901 provides for payment in advance is germane, as there decided, to the question of whether or not the supervisors had power to make similar provisions by its procedural ordinance for the payment in advance, it would seem to follow not only that the supervisors were authorized to provide for the payment of assessments in annual installments, as is also expressly authorized by section 33, but also that the phrase "annual installments" in the concluding sentence of section 33 was intended to apply to the various statutory plans already in force in other parts of the state for the payment in annual installments, as well as the particular method provided in the procedural ordinance. And, in determining whether or not the terms of the procedural ordinance adopted by the board of supervisors contained a provision for the payment in annual installments of the assessments therein provided for, it is proper to consider the corresponding provision therefor in the general statutes which the supervisors were authorized to adopt in lieu of the charter plan of street improvement, and also in lieu of the adoption of a procedural ordinance.

[4] The requirement that the property holder shall sign a bond, waiving irregularities in the proceedings, is not unreasonable or unjust. Under the state laws for the issuance of street improvement bonds, supplementing the Vrooman Act, it is usually provided that the issuance of the bond shall be conclusive evidence of the regularity of all proceedings, and the effect of such legislation is to deprive the property holder of all defenses to the assessment other than those that are jurisdictional. Chase v. Trout, 146 Cal. 350, 80 Pac. 81. The requirement that the property holder shall sign a bond can have no other effect. If there is no jurisdiction in the authorities of the city and county to make the assessment, the bond given to secure the privilege of paying such void assessment in annual installments would be without consideration, and void. City Street Improvement Co. v. Pearson, supra. To require the property holder to waive informalities and defects which are not jurisdictional is not unreasonable or unjust. Where the lot is assessed for more that 50 per cent. of its assessed value for taxation purposes, the provision of the bond, although containing an express promise to pay the assessment, would not create a personal liability, for such promise would be without consideration. Whether it would create such a personal obligation where the assessment was less than this amount, and the extension is a privilege secured by such a promise, is a matter that need not be determined on this appeal.

[5] We will next consider the question of the provision for the semiannual payment of interest. From one point of view the payment of 7 per cent. interest semiannually increases the rate of interest. Skinner v. Santa Rosa, 107 Cal. 464, 470, 40 Pac. 742, 29 L. R. A. 512; Derby v. Modesto, 104 Cal. 515, 523, 38 Pac. 900. The question, then, is whether by this requirement the board of supervisors have violated that provision of the charter which says that "* * * the rate of interest to be paid on such payments not to exceed 7 per cent. per annum." Section 33, supra. It is to be observed that the charter does not fix the time of the payment of interest, nor specifically provide that it shall be paid annually. The supervisors are authorized by the charter, section 33, supra, to provide for the payment "in annual installments, covering a term not to exceed ten years, upon conditions as to said board may seem reasonable and just." The only limitation upon this power is that with reference to the rate of interest. The terms and conditions under which payments upon the installment plan are to be permitted are left entirely to the board of supervisors, to be prescribed by ordinance. They have full legislative power over the matter, and a wide discretion to be exercised in the procedural ordinance. If the term "7 per cent. per annum" has a meaning so definite and fixed that it always means 7 per cent. payable at the end of the year, then the restriction upon the board of supervisors would prevent them from requiring that interest be paid semiannually. The term "seven per cent. per annum," however, is to be construed in accordance with the common acceptation of that term. The matter of the time of the payment of interest, whether in advance, monthly, quarterly, or semiannually, is ordinarily understood to affect the term and manner of payment, rather than the rate of the interest. The terms commonly used are "7 per cent. payable monthly" or "quarterly" or "semiannually." It is more common to provide for the payment of interest upon notes and mortgages quarterly or semiannually than to provide for such payment annually, and yet the interest rate is always referred to by the rate fixed per annum. The fact that such rate is payable monthly, quarterly, or semiannually does not make the rate usurious where the rate per annum is the highest rate permitted by law. Mowry v. Bishop, 5 Paige (N. Y.) 98; Varn v. White, 68 Fla. 329, 67 South. 142; Crowell v. Jones, 167 N. C. 386, 83 S. E. 551; Goodale v. Wallace, 19 S. D. 405, 417, 103 N. W. 651, 117 Am. St. Rep. 962, 9 Ann. Cas. 545.

In Meyer v. City of Muscatine, 68 U. S. (1 Wall.) 384, 17 L. Ed. 564, the Supreme Court of the United States had under consideration the validity of that city's municipal bonds. The ordinance calling the election provided for a vote of the people upon the proposition, "to borrow for a term of years, not exceeding twenty, on bonds of the city, at a rate of interest not higher than ten per cent. per annum, $130,000," etc. The bonds issued in pursuance of the election provided for interest at the annual rate of 10 per cent., payable semiannually on the first day of January and the first day of July in each year, "and the faith of the city of Muscatine is hereby pledged for the semiannual payments of interest," etc. The court stated the ground of the defendant's opposition to the validity of the bonds issued in pursuance of the election as follows, to wit:

"Because in the stipulation to pay the interest semi-annually at the rate of 10 per cent., the authority conferred by the vote which limited the rate of interest to 'not higher than 10 per cent. per annum' was transcended, and a usurious rate agreed to be paid."

In disposing of the point the court said:

"This objection has no foundation. When a statute fixes the rate of interest per annum, it has always been held that parties may lawfully contract for the payment of that rate, before the principal debt becomes due, at periods shorter than a year." 68 U. S. (1 Wall.) 391, 17 L. Ed. 564, supra.

The theory upon which interest payable semiannually is considered a greater rate than the same interest payable annually is that it is in effect a compounding of interest—the interest being paid, the payee can reloan the money, and thus secure interest upon the interest. There is, however, this important distinction: If the interest is not paid, and no action is taken to enforce the payment, the assessment merely bears 7 per cent. per annum simple interest, so that in effect the requirement of payment of interest semiannually is a term or condition of payment, rather than an increased rate. The legal effect of this provision in the bond is that for nonpayment of interest semiannually the due date of the entire principal of the bond may be accelerated. The board of supervisors are vested with full legislative discretion to determine the terms and conditions under which the annual installments of the assessment may be paid, and the effect of the provision made is that if one-third of the assessment is paid at the time of the issuance of the bond the other installments are to be deferred for one and two years, respectively, provided that in six months accrued interest was paid on the deferred installments, that in one year the second installment was paid with accrued interest, in six months more accrued interest was paid, and in the second year the entire balance. In Skinner v. Santa Rosa, supra, the court was addressing itself to a situation where the election notice under which the bonds were issued provided that—

"Each bond shall have attached thereto a separate coupon for the interest for every year that such bond has to run, and each of said coupons shall be made therein payable, and shall be payable, at the office of the city treasurer * * * on the first Monday of December of the year for the interest whereof it is given."

In that case the election notice not only fixed annual rate and the time of payment of interest, but declared that it should be paid by coupons showing the annual interest. The notice of election also fixed the amount of taxes to be levied each year for 40 years to pay the amount of such bond. The supervisors after the election passed an ordinance changing the form of bonds, making them payable with interest at 4 per cent. per annum, payable semiannually, and made the bonds and interest "payable in gold coin of the United States of America of the present standard of weight and fineness," while the ordinance calling the election provided for bonds "payable in gold coin or lawful money of the United States." The statute required that the election notice should contain—

"The number and character of the bonds to be issued, the rate of interest to be paid, and the amount of tax levy to be made for the payment thereof." (Italics ours.)

Under such circumstances it is said by the court: "That the payment of interest semiannually increases the rate is obvious." The point really decided in that case is that the issuance of bonds providing for the payment of interest semiannually, and requiring the payment to be made in gold coin instead of gold coin or lawful money is a substantial departure from the character of bonds authorized by the people at the election, and that the city had no power to issue bonds—

"in a form which does not substantially comply with the terms stated in the ordinance of submission and notice of election and with the statute under which the proceedings were had."

In Derby v. Modesto, supra, it was held that the power to require the payment of interest semiannually was included in the power to fix the rate of interest. It does not follow, however, that the requirement that interest be paid semiannually is necessarily the exercise of the power to fix the rate of interest, rather than the power to fix the terms of payment. This view finds support in Murphy v. City of San Luis Obispo, 119 Cal. 624, 51 Pac. 1085, 39 L. R. A. 444, concerning a municipal bond election held under the same statute (Stats. 1889, p. 399, as amended; Stats. 1891, p. 94; Stats. 1893, p. 61) as was the bond election involved in Skinner v. Santa Rosa, supra. It was there said that it was unnecessary to state in the election notice whether the interest was payable annually or semiannually, and that the statement in the election notice that "the rate of interest to be paid on said bonds will be 5 per cent. per annum" is a sufficient compliance with the statutory requirement that the election notice state "the rate of interest to be paid," and declares that the statute "* * * makes no requirement with reference to the publication of the times at which the interest is payable."

If the requirement that the interest be paid semiannually or quarterly increases, the rate of interest over an annual rate, as declared in Skinner v. Santa Rosa, supra, the election notice could not state the "rate of interest" without stating the time of its payment, whether annually, semiannually or quarterly. It was for this reason, no doubt, that the chief justice pointed out in his concurring opinion that this case overruled Skinner v. Santa Rosa, supra, 119 Cal. 634, 51 Pac. 1089, 39 L. R. A. 444, as is also claimed in Carlson v. City of Helena, 39 Mont. 82, 111, 102 Pac. 39, 17 Ann. Cas. 1233. But the statement in Murphy v. City of San Luis Obispo, supra, is dictum in view of the holding that "the ordinance herein stated in sufficient terms that the interest was to be paid annually." The authority of the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco, however, is not as limited under the charter, which grants them power to fix reasonable and just conditions of payment as were the city authorities of Santa Rosa and San Luis Obispo under the statute under consideration in Skinner v. Santa Rosa, supra, and Murphy v. San Luis Obispo, supra. As has been pointed out, the provision requiring interest to be paid semiannually fixes the terms of payment of principal and interest, rather than the rate of interest. There was ample power on the part of the board of supervisors to fix the terms and conditions of payment in a general ordinance covering the whole subject, and, while it is true that we are dealing with proceedings in invitum, and that the law is to be strictly construed in favor of the property holder, we are also dealing with a clearly delegated legislative power, broad in its terms, and limited only in the two particulars with reference to the amount of the several installments and the rate of interest.

If we look to state legislation for aid in determining what conditions for payment in annual installments were considered reasonable and just by the state Legislature, we find that 20 years before the adoption of the charter amendment (section 33, supra [1913]) a law was enacted for the issuance of bonds to represent the amount of assessments on property benefited by street improvements (Stats.

1893, p. 33). These bonds were payable in equal annual installments, interest was payable semiannually, and for any default in payment of principal or interest the whole bond became immediately due and payable, and the property was to be sold to pay the amount. The people of San Francisco in adopting the charter amendment must be deemed to have had in mind this and similar legislative plans for the payment of street assessments in annual installments, particularly as the charter amendment expressly authorized the board of supervisors to adopt such general state laws. As already pointed out, the provisions for the signing of a bond by the property owner for the semiannual payment of interest, and for the acceleration of the due date of the bond, as provided in such statutes, if adopted by an ordinance of the supervisors so enacting, would no doubt be held to provide such a scheme for annual installments as would have removed the inhibition of section 8, supra, under the express terms of the last sentence of section 33 above quoted; and, hence, it follows that a similar provision in a procedural ordinance enacted by the board of supervisors would have the same effect. Hayne v. City and County of San Francisco, supra. We think, on the whole, in view of similar legislation by the state, that the ordinance provides for payments in annual installments within the meaning of the concluding sentence of section 33 of the charter, supra, and for that reason that section 8 of the charter, supra, does not apply, and, hence, that the assessments herein sued upon, although more than 50 per cent. of the assessed value of the lots, are not void for that reason.

[6] Appellants contend, however, that a suit for the entire amount of the assessment before the expiration of three years is not authorized by the ordinance, and that therefore this proceeding is premature. This is only another way of saying that the provision made for the payment of the assessment in annual installments is not in compliance with the charter and is answered by the above considerations. It is true, however, that there is no express provision in the statute for a suit for the full amount of the assessment where the property holder fails to give a bond. It is expressly provided in section 35 of the street improvement ordinance that in the event of a void or faulty bond, or where the bond is not given by the owner, the contractor may sue to recover the assessment. While no express provision is made for the collection of the entire assessment in case the owner fails to give a bond, it is expressly declared that the assessment creates a lien upon the property for the full amount thereof, and in the absence of some provision postponing the time of payment a suit could be instituted at any time after demand as provided in section 35. This, we think, is clearly implied in the ordinance, and authorized by the charter. This conclusion was reached by the District Court of Appeal (First District) in Hutton v. Newhouse, 41 Cal. App. 689, 183 Pac. 276, and a rehearing was denied by this court.

[7] In addition to these points going to the merits of the case, appellants contend that the complaint is faulty for the reason that it does not expressly set out in hæc verba the street improvement ordinance of the city and county of San Francisco. It merely alleges that proceedings were had under and in pursuance of provisions of a certain ordinance of the city and county of San Francisco, giving number, title, and date of passage. Under section 459, Code of Civil Procedure, it is sufficient to plead an ordinance by title and date of passage. It is true that the allegation is not a direct one that the ordinance was passed on a certain date. But this mere formal defect cannot justify a reversal of the case where the terms of the ordinance appear in the record before us. Const. art. 6, § 4½. The point is made that section 459, Code of Civil Procedure, differs from corresponding provisions of the practice act of 1850 (Stats. 1850–53, p. 528, § 61), in that section 459 omits to provide that the courts shall take judicial notice of the ordinance so pleaded. This change is of no significance in the case at bar, for the reason that upon the trial the ordinance was proved by a certified copy thereof.

The judgment is affirmed.

FEDERAL CONST. CO. v. NEWHOUSE et al. (two cases). (S. F. 8793, 8794.)

(Supreme Court of California. June 18, 1921. Rehearing Denied July 18, 1921.)

1. Municipal corporations ⟸454—Small departures from lawful procedure fatal to street assessment in absence of curative provisions.

In proceedings in invitum, small departures from the lawful procedure are fatal to a street improvement assessment in the absence of curative provisions.

2. Municipal corporations ⟸432—Assessment of cost of sewer along property fronting thereon only held proper.

In street improvement proceedings under the San Francisco street improvement ordinance, the assessment of the cost of the sewer only along the property fronting thereon held proper.

3. Municipal corporations ⊂=487—Invalidity of sewer assessment not available to owner of land not affected thereby.

In street improvement proceedings, an owner could not complain of the invalidity of the separate and distinct sewer assessment in a block in which such owner's property was not located, since invalidity of sewer assessment did not affect validity of assessment of owner's land for improvement of street.

4. Municipal corporations ⊂=488, 489(5) — Errors in assessment held not to invalidate assessment in view of owner's failure to appeal.

In street improvement proceedings under San Francisco street improvement ordinance, under San Francisco City Charter, art. 6, c. 2, § 33, errors in assessment appearing on the face thereof, which could have been corrected on appeal and which were not jurisdictional in character, held not to invalidate assessment, in view of owner's failure to appeal.

5. Municipal corporations ⊂=446—Contractor entitled to assessment on completion of work within contract period, notwithstanding city's delay in acceptance.

A contractor who actually completed street improvement within the time fixed by the contract was entitled to assessment, notwithstanding street superintendent's delay in acceptance of the work until after the time fixed had expired.

Appeals from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John T. Nourse, Judge.

Action by the Federal Construction Company against Arthur A. Newhouse and others. Judgments for plaintiff, and named defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Hugo D. Newhouse, Russell P. Tyler, and Jesse A. Mueller, all of San Francisco, Milton R. Shepardson (Charles W. Cobb, of San Francisco, of counsel, and Frank W. Sawyer, of San Francisco, amicus curiæ), for appellants.

H. K. Eells, of San Francisco, A. C. H. Hart, of Los Angeles, and Raymond Benjamin, of San Francisco (Randolph V. Whiting, Fabius T. Finch, Paul F. Fratessa, and John B. Gartland, all of San Francisco, amici curiæ), for respondent.

WILBUR, J. Defendants appeal from judgments rendered against them foreclosing the lien of street assessments for the improvement of Nineteenth avenue, in San Francisco, with all street crossings but one between Quintara and Vicente streets, by paving, curbing, and sewering; the latter for one block only. The appeals from the two judgments are to be considered together, and only differ for the reason that they are for assessments upon different properties, and against different persons. The same points are raised as in Federal Construction Co. v. Wolfson (S. F. No. 8807) 199 Pac. 512, this day decided, and have been determined therein against appellants' contention. In addition to the points there raised it is claimed that the assessment is void for failure to comply with certain provisions of the street improvement ordinance of San Francisco with relation to the manner of making and levying of assessments. In making the assessment the five separate blocks in which the work was done were separately assessed. In four of the blocks the cost of curbing and paving were added, and a single front-foot rate of $5.881867 was ascertained as the rate to cover this cost and the proper proportion of incidental expenses. In the other block only, between Vicente and Ulloa streets, a sewer was laid, and in this block separate assessments were levied for each item, curbing, paving, and sewer, with a front-foot rate of $.770087 for curbing, $5.125058 for paving, and $1.026121 for sewer. Thus the cost per front foot for curbing and paving in this block was $5.895145. Hence the rate for pavement and curbing is greater by $.013278 in this block.

This increased rate is due to two factors: First, a charge of $15 is made for inspection of curbing in this block, and $90 is made for the inspection of pavements, whereas in all the other blocks the charge for inspection of both paving and curbing is $90. This item of $15 accounts for $.01304 of the difference, and the balance, $.000238 per front foot, is due to the fact that the one-fifth of the whole amount of the incidental expenses for printing and engineering was apportioned to a frontage of 1,150 instead of 1,200 feet, as in the other blocks. If the rate of assessment had been the same in each block, the mere fact of separate estimates in each block would be of no importance.

[1] The difference in the rate of assessment for curbing and paving in the block between Vicente and Ulloa streets of $.013278 in excess of that in other blocks is small, but in proceedings in invitum small departures from the lawful procedure are fatal to the assessment, in the absence of curative provisions. Chapman v. Jocelyn, 187 Pac. 962. In this block the frontage is 1,200 feet, yet only 1,150 feet of curbing is charged for, and the cost is assessed on 1,150 feet of frontage. For some reason, perhaps because the curb was already laid, one 50-foot lot is not assessed for curbing. The contract price of curbing was $.75 per lineal foot. The result of this method was that each lot assessed for curbing was assessed at the same rate for curbing as in all other blocks, except for incidental expenses, as above stated. The cost of engineering, printing, and inspecting was apportioned equally between the five blocks, and equally assessed within those blocks, with the exception noted. Thus the separation of the assessment into five different blocks resulted in no inequality in the assessment other than that due to the omission of one lot from the curbing assessment and the unequal distribution of the assessment for incidental expenses.

The lot of the defendant Newhouse has a frontage along Nineteenth avenue greater than one-half a block. Only that part of his lot within the quarter block is liable for assessment for the improvement of the adjacent street crossing. There is a failure in the diagram and assessment to indicate the portion of the lot liable for the street crossing assessment, although that assessment is correctly computed upon the frontage of the lot within the quarter block and liable for the assessment. The error is in extending the lien thereof over the whole of the lot. To state the objection in the language of the respondent, the appellant relies upon the failure to draw the usual red line indicating the limit of the quarter block. The error complained of has been held fatal to an assessment under the Vrooman Act (St. 1885, p. 147). Parker v. Reay, 76 Cal. 103–105, 18 Pac. 124; Dyer v. Harrison, 63 Cal. 447, 450. This error, however, only applies to the crossing assessment, amounting to $161.88. These trivial errors could have been readily remedied if the attention of the city officials had been called thereto by an appeal, but it has been uniformly held under the provisions of the Vrooman Act (section 11), that the owner is not aggrieved by an assessment which is void on its face (Ryan v. Altschul, 103 Cal. 174–177, 37 Pac. 339), and may assert its invalidity in court. These errors appear on the face of the assessment.

[2, 3] Before discussing the effect of these errors under the San Francisco street improvement ordinance, one other alleged error appearing upon the face of the assessment may be disposed of, namely, the assessment of the cost of the sewer only along the property fronting on the same. This was the proper method of assessment, as the sewer improvement was virtually a separate and independent improvement, no doubt incorporated in the plan of improvement solely because it was desirable to have the sewers laid before the street was paved. The defendants, in any event, cannot complain of the invalidity of the separate and distinct sewer assessment. If invalid that part alone was invalid. Perine v. Lewis, 128 Cal. 236, opinion denying rehearing, page 241, 60 Pac. 422, 772. The defendants' property is not located in the block in which the cost of the sewer was assessed, and in which the excessive amount of incidental expenses was apportioned, and they cannot complain thereof. See Dyer v. Parrott, 60 Cal. 551.

Defendants were, however, injuriously affected by the failure to include one 50-foot lot in the assessment for curbing, and in the case of a frontage assessment, under the Vrooman Act, where such error appears on the face of the record, the whole assessment is void. See authorities cited in Larsen v. San Francisco, 186 Pac. 757, 763. Two errors, then, appear upon the face of the assessment, one affecting the assessment for curbing, and the other the assessment for the work done in the street crossing. It has been uniformly held, under the Vrooman Act and its various amendments, that where an assessment is void upon its face, even though it could be readily corrected on appeal, a property holder is not aggrieved by such void assessment, and that the contractor, being the party aggrieved, should appeal, and, failing thus to have the assessment corrected, is unable to enforce the invalid assessment. Ryan v. Altschul, 103 Cal. 174, 37 Pac. 339; City Securities Co. v. Harvey, 176 Cal. 682, 169 Pac. 380.

[4] If these decisions under the Vrooman Act apply in this case we must hold invalid the crossing assessment and the curbing assessment. It is to be determined, then, whether the provisions of the street improvement ordinance so far differ from the Vrooman Act as to justify any other conclusion. The point of difference relied upon by respondent is the provision with reference to the remedy by appeal, and the conclusive effect of a failure to appeal contained in section 21 of the street improvement ordinance and section 11 of the Vrooman Act. Section 21 of the ordinance is identical in language with section 26 of the Street Improvement Act of 1911 (Stats. 1911, p. 730), considered in the recent decision in Oakland Paving Co. v. Whittell Realty Co., 195 Pac. 1058. The review of the authorities therein contained makes unnecessary an extensive consideration of them in this case. It must be conceded that the errors of computation which appear on the face of the assessment were such as could have been readily corrected on appeal, and were not jurisdictional in character. It follows that under the curative provisions of the ordinance (section 21, supra) the court cannot declare the assessment void because of these irregularities or informalities, notwithstanding the fact that they appear on the face of the assessment.

The reasons which impelled the court to hold that an assessment void on its face might be so declared by the court, notwithstanding the failure of the property owner to appeal, do not apply. The supervisors having power on appeal to correct the assessment for curbing and for crossing so as to conform to the street improvement ordinance, and opportunity being given to the parties to appeal to them for correction, the question narrows itself down to the inquiry as to whether or not the property holder is aggrieved by the defect, and for that reason required to appeal. The reasoning of the decisions is such that if we hold the assessment void because of errors appearing on its face he is not aggrieved. If we hold it valid, notwithstanding such errors, he would, of course, be aggrieved. The ordinance specifically directs, so far as the supervisors have power to accomplish that purpose, that the court shall not hold an assessment invalid on account of such defect. If we obey this behest the property holder is the one who was aggrieved by the error in the assessment and he should have appealed for its correction.

The effect of this legislation is merely to throw on the property holder the burden of appealing from an assessment to correct errors or informalities therein, in default of which the assessment is valid. This is a reasonable construction of the ordinance, and, giving it that effect, it follows that the defendants, having failed to appeal to the board of supervisors for the correction of these errors, are bound by the assessment. The decisions of this court concerning the validity of street assessments under the Vrooman Act, and similar statutes, wherein it is held that this court will declare void any assessment which departs from the statutory method of assessment where such departure appears from the face of the assessment, and that the property holder is not required to seek the correction thereof by the city council or other local legislative body, have no application to this ordinance.

All other defects in the assessment and diagram relied on by the appellants to show its invalidity, such as the use of the customary sign to indicate feet (') and inches (") are sufficiently met by stating that the exclusive remedy therefor was likewise by appeal.

[5] There remains but one other question, and that is whether or not the failure to complete the work within the time limited in the contract is fatal to the assessment. Under the Vrooman Act it has been held that such failure invalidates the assessment. Kelso v. Cole, 121 Cal. 121, 53 Pac. 353. It also has been uniformly held under the Vrooman Act that the remedy for a failure to fully perform the contract where the work has been accepted and an assessment issued therefor is by an appeal to the city council or other legislative body, according to section 11. McLaughlin v. Knobloch, 161 Cal. 676, 120 Pac. 27; Creed v. McCombs, 146 Cal. 449, 80 Pac. 679; Lambert v. Bates, 137 Cal. 676, 70 Pac. 777; Petaluma Paving Co. v. Singley, 136 Cal. 616, 69 Pac. 426; Hadley v. Dague, 130 Cal. 207, 62 Pac. 500; Girvin v. Simon, 116 Cal. 604, 48 Pac. 720; McIntyre v. Los Angeles, 23 Cal. App. 681, 139 Pac. 240, rehearing denied. The court in this case found that the work was completed in time, and appellants attack this finding as unsupported by the evidence. The utmost claimed by the defendants is that some minor portions of the work were incomplete at the time the first extension of the contract expired, and that there was a hiatus between the first and second extension. The plaintiff, however, claims that the work was completed before the expiration of the time fixed in the contract and before the granting of the second extension, and that the purpose of the second extension was merely to carry the time of completion beyond the period of appeal. Evidence was produced by the plaintiff to the effect that the work was fully completed before the expiration of the first extension, and the court found that such was the fact. If the contract was actually completed within the time fixed in the contract by valid extensions thereof, as the court found, the assessment was not invalidated because it was not issued until after the time for completion had expired. If the contractor finished the work within the time required he was entitled to the assessment, even though the acceptance by the street superintendent was delayed.

In view of this conclusion of the trial court as to the fact of completion, which is sustained by the evidence, we are not required to consider whether evidence of noncompletion is admissible under the authority last hereinabove cited (McLaughlin v. Knobloch, and other cases, supra), nor whether the curative clause of section 21 validates the assessment under the decision in Oakland Paving Co. v. Whittell Realty Co., supra. In this connection it should be observed that, while the curative clause of the statute therein considered (Stats. 1911, p. 730, § 26) is the same as in the street improvement ordinance of San Francisco, section 14 of the ordinance expressly provides that—

"In case of failure on the part of the contractor * * * to complete * * * his contract within the time fixed in the contract, or within such extension of said time * * * his * * * contract shall be void, and no assessment shall be made for the work done under said contract."

Whether in the light of this legislative declaration a failure to complete the work within the time indicated could be declared an error, irregularity, or informality, is a question we need not determine, but one which may well command the attention of the board of supervisors of the city and county of San Francisco.

The judgments are affirmed.

LAMMERS v. PACIFIC ELECTRIC RY. CO.

Carriers ⇐369 — Ejectment not proximate cause of injuries sustained more than three-fourths of a mile from place of ejectment.

A railroad was not liable for injuries to person on track on theory that it had negligently ejected him for failure to produce ticket or fare, though he was in a helpless condition as a result of intoxication or other causes, where injuries were sustained three-fourths of a mile from the place of the ejectment; the ejectment in such case not being the proximate cause of the injuries.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Leslie R. Hewitt, Judge.

Action by Richard Lammers against the Pacific Electric Railway Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Frank Karr, R. C. Gortner, E. E. Morris, W. R. Millar, and C. W. Cornell, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Earl Rogers and Charles E. Williams, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WILBUR, J. The facts are correctly stated in the opinion of the District Court of Appeal, and we adopt that statement of the facts, but with certain minor changes. For that reason we do not use quotation marks.

This is an appeal from a judgment awarding plaintiff the sum of $2,500 as damages for personal injuries sustained, so it is alleged, as the result of being wrongfully expelled by defendant's conductor from its passenger train while in a helpless condition and unable to care for himself at a time and place where he was likely to be injured by other cars of defendant, which were being operated at and past the point of ejectment at frequent intervals.

The injuries suffered were serious. The left limb of plaintiff was crushed by the car wheels passing over it at a point which made it necessary to amputate it above the knee. Several ribs were broken, and he was otherwise injured.

At the time he sustained injuries plaintiff was about 30 years of age. He was low in mentality, and scarcely able to converse intelligently on very ordinary subjects. He had been subject to epileptic seizures or some other nervous affection strongly resembling epilepsy, since the age of 14 years, having as many as two convulsions a month. This affliction, together with his mental feebleness, made it unsafe for him to work with machinery or attempt any labor requiring the exercise of unusual care. He was therefore doomed to the performance of the simpler tasks of life. While not habitually addicted to the use of intoxicating liquors, he was known to have indulged in its use upon occasions to a noticeable degree. His home was near El Monte, some distance out of the city of Los Angeles and on the line of defendant's electric railway connecting Los Angeles with various suburban districts.

Plaintiff purchased a ticket at El Monte for Los Angeles and return on the evening of May 22, 1917. The purpose of the trip made by him to Los Angeles on this evening was to purchase some minor articles. On returning he took the 10:10 p. m. car for El Monte, occupying a seat with an elderly gentleman near the rear of the car. The conductor testified that plaintiff, when first observed by him, was "slouched down" in his seat with his hat over his face, presenting the appearance of a man half asleep or intoxicated. In response to a request for his fare plaintiff took out his pocketbook, but was unable to find either ticket or money. The conductor had difficulty in getting audible or intelligent utterances from him. Upon being questioned as to his destination he stated that he was "going where dad went," referring to the elderly gentleman seated at his side. When further questioned by the conductor as to where "dad" was going, plaintiff replied, "El Monte."

Without any apparent reason therefor, plaintiff said that "dad" would pay his fare. The conductor asked the elderly gentleman if plaintiff was a member of his party, and received a negative answer. Apparently he had no acquaintance with plaintiff. Being unable after a "jumbling" search, to find either ticket or fare, plaintiff was told, according to the testimony of the conductor, to get off the train at Covina Junction, about 10:25 p. m. This he did with the conductor's assistance. The next morning at about 5 o'clock he was found near the left rail of the outbound track about three-quarters of a mile east of Covina Junction badly mangled. Evidently he had attempted to make his way home. The defendant operates a double-track system from Covina Junction past the point where plaintiff was found.

Covina Junction is a railway junction in Los Angeles city. The train carrying plaintiff was a through train to El Monte. Covina Junction is a transfer point for passengers destined for Pasadena, Alhambra, and other points on the Pasadena Short Line, operated by the defendant. It is the stipulation of counsel that—

"Covina Junction * * * is one of these little places where passengers can sit, but not in charge of any one, and with no agent there; one of these shelters with a seat and a roof over it."

There is, however, testimony seemingly in conflict with the stipulation and to the effect that the waiting room was about 10 feet square, with glass on four sides. The nearest residence house was about 100 feet from the station, situated on a slight bluff or elevation at the end of a bridge. The next nearest structure was defendant's substation, about 150 feet distant. The testimony is uncertain as to whether or not either of said buildings was actually occupied by any one at the time of the injury. The next nearest residence was from one-eighth to one-quarter of a mile east of the station. The roadbed of the track leading away from the station was built within the limits of a barranca with slight bluffs on either side. Especially is this true as to the elevation of the inhabited territory on either side. Excavations and depressions appear to have existed in the earth near the track along the route.

The conductor described plaintiff's condition as follows:

"I took hold of him, his left elbow, or arm—some place on the left side to assist him down the steps as he appeared very wobbly—couldn't walk very well. He staggered before he reached the steps. He walked probably 10 feet to the door."

The conductor further testified that plaintiff did not fall at the time he left the car, but walked off a "little bank there in this ditch, walked down this ditch, and that is the last I saw of him. I thought he might be down there until he sobered up."

The elderly gentleman, Prof. Hagen, a teacher of music, and one or two other passengers, described the appearance of the plaintiff as a person plainly under the influence of liquor. He had offered the professor a drink from a pint bottle which he drew from his pocket. His articulation was indistinct. "Any one could tell that he was not right," is the way it was put. After being assisted from the platform to the ground he is described as "leaning backward and forward on his feet."

Witness E. H. Watson testified that plaintiff was very drunk. "I heard him make some foolish remarks; that is how my attention was called to him in the first place." Mr. Watson further testified that plaintiff had two bottles of whisky in his pockets. The testimony of the several witnesses who took special notice of plaintiff makes it clear that the power of locomotion was plainly affected and a deficient or disturbed mental condition was apparent. His conduct was neither boisterous nor offensive.

As a matter of fact plaintiff had in his possession at all times a ticket entitling him to travel as a passenger, but he was unable to produce it at the time it was demanded. His speech was incoherent then as it was when a witness several months thereafter. Witnesses who had known plaintiff for a great many years described his affliction, its effect upon him, and the duration of said seizures.

Plaintiff seems to have denied that he was or had been drinking at the time he was expelled from the train. He claimed that the conductor charged him several times with being "stewed." He also intimated that he was not given a full opportunity to find his ticket. He insists, so far as any intelligent conclusion may be drawn from his testimony, that a "spell" was coming over him such as he was afflicted with, and that he gradually lost consciousness. No one tasted or examined the contents of the bottles that some of the witnesses say he was carrying. One or two witnesses who came into close contact with him after the injury thought they smelled the odor of liquor on his breath, while a like number with equal opportunity failed to detect any odor of liquor. It is immaterial, however, whether the condition was brought about by malady or liquor. The question is, Was he in a helpless condition and unable to care for himself, and, if so, was it negligence on the part of defendant's agent to eject him under the circumstances of the situation at the point at which he was ordered and helped from the train? At least five outbound trains at rather equal intervals passed over the way he had traveled between the time of ejection and the hour that he was found. The number of inbound trains is not given, as the injury occurred on the inner rail of the outbound track. Physical evidence places it beyond question that the injury was caused by the wheels of defendant's cars passing over plaintiff's limb. No member of any one of the several train crews passing after plaintiff was ejected was produced who claimed to know anything about the injury. Plaintiff was discovered by a third party.

From the foregoing statement of facts by the District Court of Appeal it is to be observed that the plaintiff had traveled three-quarters of a mile from the point where he was ejected from the train to the point where he was injured, and that more than six hours apparently elapsed between the time of his ejection and the time of the injury. There is no evidence to support the finding of the trial court that the train which injured the plaintiff was negligently operated, and the District Court of Appeal based its judgment upon the original negligence in ejecting the plaintiff from its train. Assuming without deciding that the defendant was negligent in ejecting the plaintiff from its train in the condition in which he then was, the question is, Was such negligence the proximate cause of plaintiff's injuries? It appears from the testimony of the conductor that, however dangerous the point of his ejection may have been, plaintiff immediately left the tracks of the defendant railway and entered a ditch. If he had remained there he would have been uninjured.

The fact that he was later injured at a point three-quarters of a mile away upon the tracks of the defendant railway is of no significance in determining whether or not the defendant was negligent in ejecting the plaintiff from its train. If the plaintiff had wandered north and been injured by a Southern Pacific Railway Company's train or had succeeded in getting on one of the numerous streets and highways in the vicinity and been injured by a passing automobile, it would hardly be contended that the injury was the proximate result of the ejection.

The only connection between the ejection and the injury would be the fact that if there had been no ejection there would have been no injury. The sale of the whisky to the plaintiff would come nearer being a proximate cause of the injury than the ejection from the railway train. The peril arising from the ejection ceased the moment the passenger left the position where he could be struck by defendant's trains, while the peril arising from the use of the intoxicating liquor continued in operation up to the time of the injury and contributed thereto, and yet it has been uniformly held, in the absence of statute to the contrary, that the sale of intoxicating liquor is not the proximate cause of injuries subsequently received by the purchaser because of his intoxication. Joyce on Intoxicating Liquors, § 421; Cruse v. Aden, 127 Ill. 231, 234, 20 N. E. 73, 3 L. R. A. 327.

There is no more reason for holding the defendant liable for the injury in this case than there would be had the plaintiff wandered into some neighboring yard and been shot as a burglar. In each case the injury would have been avoided had there been no ejection of the plaintiff from the defendant's train but in each case the ejection is obviously not the proximate cause. In determining the responsibility of the defendant it must be recollected that the plaintiff, no matter how badly intoxicated he was, was entitled to go wherever he pleased, and that the agents of the defendant had no authority to exercise any restraint whatever over his person. His ability to leave the scene of the ejection is demonstrated by the fact that his injuries occurred three-quarters of a mile away. That the injury was not the proximate result of the ejection is demonstrated by the fact that the plaintiff was able to and did in fact leave the place of danger, and subsequently of his own volition returned to a position of danger on defendant's tracks, and that but for plaintiff's action in so returning to a position of danger the accident would not have occurred.

It is unnecessary to discuss the numerous cases cited by the parties in their briefs upon the question of proximate cause. Under somewhat similar facts of injuries to intoxicated persons who had been ejected from passenger trains the courts have held that the injuries under the particular circumstances of the cases were not the proximate result of the ejection. Hamilton v. Pittsburg, etc., R. R. Co., 183 Pa. 638, 38 Atl. 1085; State v. Washington, B. & A. Electric R. Co., 130 Md. 603, 101 Atl. 546; Kradel v. Pittsburg, H. B. & N. C. Ry. Co., 255 Pa. 427, 100 Atl. 128.

The following cases are cited on behalf of respondent: Doherty v. California N. & I. Co., 6 Cal. App. 131, 91 Pac. 419; Cincinnati, N. O. & T. P. Ry. Co. v. Marrs' Administratrix, 119 Ky. 954, 85 S. MILLER v. MURPHY et al. (S. F. 9176.)

1. Judgment ⊂⊃900—Parties may maintain separate action between themselves on judgment as a contract.

A judgment is a contract upon which the parties may maintain a separate action between themselves.

2. Judgment ⊂⊃883(12)—Judgment may be pleaded as counterclaim.

An outstanding indebtedness, evidenced by a judgment of a court of record in favor of the defendant and against the plaintiff, is an appropriate ground of counterclaim under Code Civ. Proc. § 438, subd. 2, which is permitted to be pleaded by section 437.

3. Judgment ⊂⊃883(12)—Joint or several judgment warranting separate action against plaintiff may be pleaded as counterclaim.

If a judgment in favor of defendant and against the plaintiff were shown to be joint and several, so that defendant could bring a separate action to enforce its obligation against the plaintiff, it could be pleaded as a counterclaim under Civ. Code, §§ 1430, 1431, 1660, and Code Civ. Proc. §§ 414, 579, and under section 1910 the parties are deemed to be the same when those between whom the evidence is offered were on opposite sides in the former case, although other parties were joined with both or either of them.

4. Action ⊂=28—Party may waive tort in conversion and sue in assumpsit.

When one's goods are wrongfully taken and used by another, he may waive the tort and sue in assumpsit for their value, as for goods sold and delivered.

5. Taxation ⊂=531(1)—Evidence held insufficient to support pleading payment of taxes on certain lots.

In an action to recover money advanced by plaintiff to defendant for the payment of taxes on lots 25 and 26 of La Loma Park, tax receipts showing assessment to persons, strangers to the record, for lots 25 and 26 in block 2242 of La Loma Park, Berkeley, are insufficient to support the allegations of the complaint; there being no presumption or inference that the lots were the same.

6. Appeal and error ⊂=695(1)—Affirmance not ordered on ground that bill of exceptions did not contain all the evidence.

Where the evidence is insufficient to support plaintiff's allegation of the advancing of money for taxes on certain lots belonging to defendant as shown on the face of the bill of exceptions, which was settled and allowed as correct, but "subject to objections of plaintiff," the ruling that the evidence is sufficient cannot be sustained on the ground that there was probable evidence to support the judgment where no objections were interposed to the sufficiency of the bill of exceptions.

7. Appeal and error ⊂=909(2)—In view of burden of proof, it would not be presumed that two parcels of land described differently were identical.

In an action to recover money advanced by plaintiff to defendant for taxes upon certain lots, it may not be assumed, in the absence of any averment to the contrary in the records or briefs, that the tracts described differently in the contract from those shown in evidence were identical, since the burden was on plaintiff to show affirmatively that he paid the taxes on the lots described in the contracts, and plaintiff was bound upon objection to the relevancy of the tax receipts to show that they referred to the property in controversy.

8. Appeal and error ⊂=1071(1)—Plaintiff's failure to serve findings of fact and conclusions of law does not require reversal in absence of showing of prejudice.

Where on the submission of the case the court directed plaintiff to prepare and serve findings of fact and conclusions of law as required by statute, plaintiff was at fault in not serving them, but in the absence of a showing of prejudice to defendants from this omission, standing alone as an assignment of error, the matter would be disregarded.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Wm. S. Wells, Judge.

Suit by Mary Miller, as administratrix of the estate of William Miller, deceased, against Ella M. Murphy and others. Judgment and decree of foreclosure in favor of plaintiff, and the defendants appeal. Reversed.

Whitmore & Henion and Welles Whitmore, all of Oakland, for appellants.

Daniel O'Connell, of San Francisco, for respondent.

SLOANE, J. This is an appeal by defendants from a judgment and decree of foreclosure in favor of plaintiff to enforce the terms of a written contract and lien.

Plaintiff's cause of action arose upon a written agreement, executed by defendants, whereby they jointly and severally contracted to repay to plaintiff money to be advanced by the latter for taxes accrued and accruing on certain parcels of land then in litigation between the parties, in the event that defendants should be adjudged the owners of the land, and creating a lien on the land as security for such advances.

That litigation resulted in defendants' favor, and this suit was brought to establish the amount of the claim and foreclose the lien.

The judgment was for $1,041.33 and costs. The land in question is described in the contract, pleadings, and findings as lots Nos. 17 and 19 in block No. 15 of "Daley's Scenic Park, Berkeley, Cal.," and "lots 25 and 26, as said lots are delineated and so designated upon that certain map entitled, La Loma Park, Berkeley, Alameda County, Cal."

The answer denied, for want of information or belief, the alleged payment of the taxes on this property, and pleaded, by way of set-off, three separate claims of defendants against the plaintiff in the respective amounts of $25.85, $56, and $419.30.

The first two of these were upon judgments in other actions for the recovery of costs against the plaintiff and in favor of one or the other of the defendants. The third claim was for money alleged to have been wrongfully collected by plaintiff from a tenant of defendants as rent of the premises, the ownership of which was then in controversy between the parties to this action, and which was adjudged to be the property of defendants.

The trial court found for plaintiff for the sum of $996.37, the amount advanced for taxes, $67.21 interest, less $22.75, which was, by consent of plaintiff, allowed on the second item of set-off, leaving the balance in favor of plaintiff, for which judgment was given.

Excepting for the $22.25 consented to by plaintiff, all of defendants' items of set-off or counterclaim were rejected.

The appeal is presented on the judgment roll and a bill of exceptions.

Appellants specify as prejudicial error: (1) The admission of certain tax receipts as evidence of payment of taxes by plaintiff upon this property, over the objection of defendants that it did not appear therefrom, and was not shown in evidence, that they applied to any of the property involved; (2) the refusal of the court to admit or consider evidence offered, or any evidence, of the judgment claims against plaintiff; (3) the refusal of the court to admit evidence offered, or any evidence, in support of the claim for rents belonging to defendants, and alleged to have been wrongfully collected by plaintiff from defendants' tenant; (4) failure of compliance with the provisions of section 634 of the Code of Civil Procedure in the matter of serving copy of the findings before they were signed by the court.

The case comes to this court on rehearing from the District Court of Appeal, where the judgment of the trial court was affirmed. Hearing in this court was granted mainly because of error in ruling that judgments for the recovery of money in favor of a defendant against the plaintiff may not be pleaded as matter of counterclaim or set-off under sections 437 and 438, Code of Civil Procedure.

[1, 2] The defendant may plead in his answer any new matter constituting a defense or counterclaim. (Code Civ. Proc. § 437); and in an action arising on contract the counterclaim may be any claim existing between the parties between whom a several judgment might be had in the action, and (2) consisting of any other cause of action arising upon contract and existing at the commencement of the action (Code Civ. Proc. § 438).

It is well settled in this state that a judgment is a contract upon which the parties may maintain a separate action between themselves. London G. & A. Co. v. Ind. Acc. Comm., 181 Cal. 460, 465, 184 Pac. 864; Weaver v. San Francisco, 146 Cal. 728, 81 Pac. 119; Bean v. Loryea, 81 Cal. 153, 22 Pac. 513; McBride v. Fallon, 65 Cal. 303, 4 Pac. 17; Wallace v. Eldredge, 27 Cal. 499; Reed v. Eldredge, 27 Cal. 346.

In Reed v. Eldredge, last cited, in an action brought upon a judgment, Rhodes, J., says:

"The judgment upon which the action was brought was a contract for the payment of a sum of money evidenced by the record of a court. The debt secured by it differs in no manner from a simple contract debt, though the evidence of the existence of the debt is of a higher and more solemn character than that by which a simple contract debt is proven."

We are of the opinion that an outstanding indebtedness evidenced by a judgment of a court of record in favor of the defendant and against the plaintiff is an appropriate ground of counterclaim under subdivision 2 of section 438, Code of Civil Procedure.

[3] Some question might be raised in this case as to the sufficiency of the showing in the bill of exceptions as to the contents and legal effect of the documentary evidence produced and offered by defendants in support of the judgments pleaded, as against the objection that the evidence offered was incompetent, irrelevant and immaterial but for the fact that it appears from the findings of the court that there was a refusal to consider these items of set-off in any way as constituting proper matter of counterclaim.

The first item set out by way of counterclaim in defendants' answer is a judgment in favor of defendants for costs against the plaintiff and others in proceedings instituted against the defendants in bankruptcy. The record of the judgment in that proceeding was admitted in evidence here, but was apparently disregarded and the claim rejected as not being a proper matter of set-off.

Attention is called in respondent's brief to the fact that the judgment for costs was against other persons than the plaintiff, who are not parties in this action, although the effect of such condition is not argued.

It may be presumed on the face of the record that this was a joint judgment, and cannot therefore, be pleaded as a set-off against one judgment debtor alone. 25 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 521; Atkins v. Churchill, 19 Conn. 396; Phelps v. Reeder, 39 Ill. 172, 177. If it were shown to be joint and several, so that defendant could bring a separate action to enforce the obligation against the plaintiff, we see no reason why it could not be pleaded as a counterclaim. Civ. Code, §§ 1430, 1431, 1660; Code Civ. Proc. §§ 414, 579; Black on Judgments, § 491; Carson v. Moore, 23 Tex. 451; Patterson v. Walton, 119 N. C. 500, 26 S. E. 451; Read v. Jeffries, 16 Kan. 534.

"The parties are deemed to be the same when those between whom the evidence is offered were on opposite sides in the former case, and a judgment or other determination could in that case have been made between them alone, though other parties were joined with both or either of them. Code Civ. Proc. § 1910.

On the second claim of the answer the trial court, by consent of plaintiff, allowed defendants a credit of $22.25, but as this item was upon a judgment for $56, defendants are entitled to relief for the court's refusal to consider the amount as a proper item of recoupment for the balance of the claim.

There is no force in the objection that the judgment is in favor of the defendant Ella M. Murphy alone. She has a right to set-off against her joint and several liability to plaintiff, and it satisfies the plaintiff's demand against both defendants to that extent.

[4] The third item of counterclaim is ambiguously pleaded, and it is difficult to determine whether the defendant seeks to recover for a tort, or on an implied contract for money belonging to the defendants, which the plaintiff had received to his own use. Treating defendants' pleading as a waiver of the tort and a claim on the implied contract to a refund of the money so received, we are of the opinion that the set-off may be allowed if the evidence supports it.

It is well settled under the authorities that, when one's goods are wrongfully taken and used by another, he may waive the tort and sue in assumpsit for their value, as for goods sold and delivered. (Pratt v. Clark, 12 Cal. 89; 2 Greenleaf on Ev. § 108; Roberts v. Evans, 43 Cal. 380; De La Guerra v. Newhall, 55 Cal. 23; Lehman v. Schmidt, 87 Cal. 15, 20, 25 Pac. 161.

There are other errors complained of and shown by the record which, although they might be disregarded as not appearing to have been prejudicial, should receive consideration in view of the necessity for a new trial.

[5] The larger part of the amounts to be advanced for taxes by the plaintiff under the contract sued on were assessments upon the property described as "lots 25 and 26, as said lots are delineated upon that certain map entitled La Loma Park, Berkeley."

The only evidence in the record of payment of such assessments were tax receipts on "lots 25 and 26 in block 2242 of La Loma Park, Berkeley," showing an assessment to persons, strangers to the record, together with testimony of the plaintiff that he paid the taxes on this property in the sum demanded in his complaint. The witness at the time was shown the receipts in dispute.

There is no presumption or inference arising from these tax receipts, or plaintiff's testimony, justifying a conclusion that lots 25 and 26 of La Loma Park is the same property described as lots 25 and 26 of block 2242 of La Loma Park. If any presumption may be indulged in the matter, it would more naturally be that there were at least some 2241 other blocks in La Loma Park containing lots numbered 25 and 26, as it is customary to make such subdivision with some regularity as to the number of lots in each block. The inference from the first description would be that these lots were independent parts of the subdivision of the whole tract, and not subdivisions of other subdivisions into blocks.

[6] It is argued that the finding of the court on this point should be upheld on the ground that the bill of exceptions on its face shows that it does not include all the evidence taken on the trial.

There is nothing to indicate that there might have been other evidence on this issue. The bill of exceptions was settled and allowed as correct, and therefore purports to be a full and true statement of the proceedings on the trial. There is appended to the certificate the statement that it is "subject to objections of plaintiff," whatever that may mean. There is nothing before us on this appeal to show any objections interposed to the sufficiency of the bill of exceptions, or any attempt to supply any omissions, if such are claimed, by diminution of the record.

[7] It might perhaps be assumed, in the absence of any averment to the contrary in the records or the briefs, that these tracts as thus variously described were identical. But, on the other hand, the burden was upon the plaintiff to show affirmatively that he had paid the taxes on the lots described in his contract, and, if there was merely a discrepancy in these descriptions, it would have been a very easy matter, and was plaintiff's duty, upon objection to the relevancy of his tax receipts, to show that they referred to the property in controversy.

[8] Defendants also were entitled to service upon them of a copy of the findings before they were signed by the judge. It appears from the record that on the submission of the case the court directed the plaintiff to prepare and serve findings of fact and conclusions of law, as required by statute. The findings were not served. There is no claim or showing of prejudice to defendants from this omission, however, and, standing alone as an assignment of error, it would be disregarded. Baker v. Eilers, 175 Cal. 656, 166 Pac. 1006; Jarvis v. Frey, 175 Cal. 690, 166 Pac. 997; Const. art. 6, sec. 4½.

On the other grounds heretofore stated the judgment is reversed.

WHITAKER v. TITLE INS. & TRUST CO. (L. A. 5797.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 6, 1921.)

1. Insurance ⟸426½—Company guaranteeing title, subject to validity of judgment for plaintiff's assignor, whose title it stated was good in opinion of its attorneys, responsible only for truthfulness of latter statement.

Where an abstract company guaranteed a title, subject to an action to quiet title against plaintiff's assignor, which the certificate showed had resulted in a judgment for the latter, prior to which the plaintiff in such action had deeded the land to another, who in turn executed a trust deed to a corporation to secure a note, on default in the payment of which the corporation executed a deed, which the certificate stated, in the opinion of the attorneys for the abstract company, passed no title, the only representation as to the effect of such litigation, for which such company could be held, would be the truthfulness of the statement that such was the opinion of their attorneys; the effect of qualifying the general guaranty of title being to inform the beneficiaries of the certificate that their title was subject to the validity of the judgment in their favor, which the company was unwilling to insure, but which in the opinion of its attorneys was good.

2. Insurance ⟸426½—Abstract maker not liable for omission of details showing nonfinality of judgment for plaintiff's assignor, certificate not purporting to give full record or legal effect of court proceedings.

Though a recital in an abstract of title to real estate, regarding claims adverse to those of the assignee of a note secured by a mortgage thereon, failed to set forth details of certain litigation to quiet title thereto, subject to which the title was guaranteed, showing that a judgment in favor of the assignor was not final, the company making such abstract was not liable for a failure of title resulting therefrom; the certificate not purporting to give the full record or legal effect of such court proceedings, and there being no evidence of conspiracy or fraud.

3. Evidence ⟸258(1), 413—Testimony as to oral statements of abstract company's attorney regarding contents and legal effect of title certificate inadmissible.

In an action against a title guaranty company for the failure of a title guaranteed, subject to the validity of a judgment in favor of plaintiff's assignor, where defendant stated in its certificate that in the opinion of its attorneys the adverse claimant's title was not good, testimony of such assignor as to oral statements made by defendant's attorney regarding the contents of the certificate and its legal effect was inadmissible, being an attempt to vary the terms of a written instrument, and because no showing was made of his authority to interpret the contract of the corporation.

4. Fraud ⟸29—Oral statements of defendant title guaranty company's attorney to plaintiff's assignor as to legal effect of certificate of title not available to plaintiff.

In an action against a title guaranty company for failure of title guaranteed, subject to the validity of a judgment, for plaintiff's assignor, whose title in the opinion of defendant's attorneys was good, testimony as to oral statements made by the head of defendant's legal department to such assignor, who was the immediate beneficiary of the certificate of title, if competent to show an attempt to mislead him, were of no avail to the plaintiff, not having been made or communicated to him, and he having testified that he relied on the certificate alone, and the fraud, if any, being on the assignor, to whose cause of action therefor plaintiff had not succeeded by assignment or otherwise.

5. Insurance ⟸426½—Company not insurer of title, where it assumed only to give opinion of its attorneys.

An abstract company, which guaranteed a claimant's title, subject to the validity of a judgment, for his assignor, stating in the certificate that, in the opinion of its attorneys, an adverse claim as successor in title from the party against whom such judgment was rendered was unfounded, was not responsible as an insurer or guarantor of title, in the absence of proof that such claimant was deceived by fraudulent misrepresentations; it having only assumed to give it as the opinion of its attorneys that the adverse claim was unfounded, not even adopting such opinion as its own, and the language not being ambiguous or misleading.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Paul J. McCormick, Judge.

Action by Frank Whitaker against the Title Insurance & Trust Company. Judgment for plaintiff was affirmed by the District Court of Appeal, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

See, also, 179 Cal. 111, 175 Pac. 460.

C. H. Brock, J. N. Hastings, and O'Melveny, Millikin & Tuller, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

J. W. Bell, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

R. C. Springer, of San Diego, amicus curiæ.

SLOANE, J. The defendant, Title Insurance & Trust Company, is appealing from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff and respondent, as damages for the failure of title to certain real property, claimed to have been covered and guaranteed by a certificate of title issued by the defendant company to plaintiff's assignor, one C. B. Williams. The exact form of the transaction between plaintiff and his assignor was the assignment of a promissory note by the latter to the former for $7,000, secured by a mortgage upon the real property in question. The note and mortgage were executed to Williams by a corporation, the Caruthers Building Company, and were assigned to plaintiff by Williams without recourse. The corporation was insolvent. Its title to the mortgaged property failed, and the plaintiff here lost his investment in the note and mortgage, amounting to $6,391, besides some further sum in attempting to realize on the security, by reason, as he claims, of relying upon the certificate of title issued by defendant company.

The question before us is the liability of the Title Insurance & Trust Company to the plaintiff upon the certificate of title. There are many intricate questions raised on this appeal, and elaborately briefed and argued, as to the nature and extent of the liability of title insurance and abstract companies in certifying, guaranteeing, or insuring titles to real estate, and as to the rights of third parties relying upon such certificates as successors in interest to the persons to whom such certificates are directly issued. Under our interpretation of the terms of this contract, however, it will be unnecessary to discuss most of the points presented.

[1] Conceding, without deciding, that the plaintiff is entitled to the full benefit of the certificate issued to his assignor, his rights in the premises are limited to the express terms of the document. Instead of guaranteeing or insuring against the adverse claims to this real property which eventually defeated plaintiff's security, the certificate of the Title Company is expressly made subject thereto. The certificate on its face purports to have been issued to Caruthers Building Company, a corporation, and C. B. Williams. After reciting the examination of the various official records pertaining to this title, the document provides that—

"The Title Insurance & Trust Company hereby guarantees that said title as appears from said records is vested in Caruthers Building Company, a corporation, subject to matters set forth in note following description."

The note referred to is as follows:

"Note.—On November 16, 1906, suit was begun in the superior court in and for said county. Case No. 54219, by William Reid, plaintiff, v. C. B. Williams et al., defendants, wherein it was sought to obtain judgment declaring a certain deed theretofore executed by plaintiff to be a mortgage and to quiet title to lands above described in plaintiff. Notice of the pendency of said action was recorded in the recorder's office of said county on November 16, 1906. Judgment for plaintiff was filed March 17, 1909. Motion for new trial was made and a new trial granted February 21, 1911. Judgment was rendered May 18, 1911, by stipulation of the parties, whereby it was adjudged that defendant C. B. Williams was the owner of said lands at the date of the beginning of said action, and at all times during the pendency of said action, and at the date of said judgment, and that plaintiff take nothing by said action; said Williams being the immediate grantor of the vestee herein. On August 22, 1909, William Reid executed a deed of said lands to William A. Hunter. On August 24, 1909, William A. Hunter and wife executed a trust deed of said lands to Union Trust & Realty Company, to secure a note for thirty-two hundred dollars ($3,200.00), in favor of German-American Savings Bank. On October 24, 1910, the Union Trust & Realty Company executed a deed to Parley M. Johnson, which deed contains recital as to default payment of indebtedness secured by said trust deed and sale thereunder. In the opinion of the attorneys for said company, said Parley M. Johnson obtained no title to said lands by reason of sale and deed to him."

Granting plaintiff the fullest recourse against defendant company, the foregoing is all he has to rely upon. The effect of this reference to the litigation of an adverse claim to real property was to inform the beneficiaries of the certificate that their title, otherwise guaranteed, was subject to the validity of the judgment in their favor in said action which the Title Company was unwilling to insure, but which it states, in the opinion of its attorneys, was good. To put the matter more simply, the Title Company, in effect says:

"We guarantee that your title to this property is good, subject to the validity of certain legal proceedings determined in your favor, and which in the opinion of our attorneys confirm your title, but the conclusiveness of which we do not vouch for."

Is it not plain that the only representation as to the effect of this litigation the defendant could be held for would be the truthfulness of the statement that such was the opinion of their attorneys? There could have been no purpose in qualifying this general guaranty of title, by making it subject to the proceedings set out in the note, other than as a reservation to the guaranty of any failure of title that might arise under this litigation. At best, all the plaintiff has to rely upon here is the opinion of the abstract company or its attorneys, and there is no showing that such opinion was not held and given in good faith.

[2] There are allegations in the complaint that the recitals regarding the adverse claims on this property failed to set forth certain details of the litigation, which, if stated, would have informed persons relying upon the certificate that the judgment in favor of plaintiff's assignor had not become final, and it is averred that the certificate "was so framed for the express purpose of aiding said Caruthers Building Company and said C. B. Williams in selling and disposing of said lands and said note and mortgage, and with the intention of inducing third parties to purchase the same." But the certificate does not purport to give the full record or legal effect of the court proceedings, or to be even an abstract of the record, and we find no evidence in the case to justify a finding of conspiracy or fraud.

[3] Testimony of C. B. Williams was admitted in behalf of plaintiff and over the objection of defendant as to certain oral statements made by the head of the legal department of the defendant company regarding the contents of the certificate and its legal effect.

[4] These conversations were inadmissible, being an attempt to vary the terms of a written instrument, and because no showing was made of authority on the part of the head of the legal department to interpret the contract of the corporation. But, even if competent to show an attempt to mislead Williams, the immediate beneficiary of the certificate of title, they can be of no avail to the plaintiff here, because they do not appear to have been made or communicated to the plaintiff, and in testifying in his own behalf he stated repeatedly that in purchasing the note and mortgage he relied upon this certificate of the abstract company, "and nothing else," as to the title to the real property. If these conversations tended to establish fraud it was fraud upon Williams, and the plaintiff has not succeeded by assignment or otherwise to any cause of action which Williams might have for fraud, particularly as he was in no wise informed of or misled by the representations, but relied solely upon the terms of the written instrument.

[5] And this, as has been pointed out, contained a reservation as to the adverse claim of title under which plaintiff's title was defeated, that the defendant company only assumed to give it as the opinion of its attorneys that the adverse claim was unfounded, and does not even adopt such opinion as its own. It may be conceded that a layman, acting without legal advice, might easily be, and in this instance doubtless was, mistaken as to the legal effect of such an expression; but the language is not ambiguous or misleading, and does not impose upon the defendant, in the absence of proof that the plaintiff was deceived by fraudulent misrepresentations, the responsibility of an insurer or guarantor of title.

The judgment is reversed.

MILLER v. BRODE. (L. A. 5754.)

1 Husband and wife ⊂=266 — Character of property as wife's established by deed to her with husband's consent.

Where the deed whereby a ranch was acquired conveyed it to a wife as sole grantee, and described it as her separate property, being so made with the husband's consent, the character of the property as the wife's separate property was definitely established, being the same as if the husband had himself conveyed community property to her by deed expressing that she took it as her separate estate, which would be an express gift by him to her of community property.

2. Evidence ⊂=461(2)—Evidence husband did not intend property should become wife's inconsequential.

Except for the purpose of showing fraud or some other ground for setting aside a transaction whereby a husband permitted property to be conveyed to his wife as her separate property, evidence that the husband did not intend that the property should become the wife's separate property is wholly inconsequential.

3. Husband and wife ⊂=265—Wife's funds deposited in community account took its character.

If husband and wife considered their bank account a community account, and the wife chose to deposit her separate funds in it, such funds took the character of the account.

4. Husband and wife ⊂=262(1)—Half interest taken by wife as separate estate, other half taken by husband as community property, in view of presumption under statute.

Where realty was purchased partly with the separate funds and estate of a wife and partly with community funds of herself and husband, and title was taken in the name of both the wife and her husband, the half interest which the conveyance on its face operated to convey to the wife was taken and held by her as her separate estate, and the other half was taken and held by the husband as community property, such being the presumption on the face of the deed under Civ. Code, § 164.

5. Deeds ⊂=61—Transaction whereby husband and wife made deeds to each other with survivorship understanding ineffective.

Where a husband and his wife some time before the wife's death each executed a deed to the other and placed them in their safe deposit box on the understanding that on the death of one the survivor would take all the property by the deed of the one dying, and the deed of the survivor would not take effect, the transaction was wholly ineffective.

6. Deeds ⊂=54—Undelivered deeds inoperative.

Deeds undelivered are inoperative.

7. Descent and distribution ⊂=72 — Daughter entitled to have release of claims on mother's estate set aside either for fraud or mistake.

Where a widower told his deceased wife's daughter that her mother had conveyed all her property to him and had left no estate, thereby inducing the daughter to execute a release of her claims on her mother's estate to him, and such statement was not in fact true, whether the widower knew the statement was false, or believed it to be true, either on the ground of fraud or mistake, within Civ. Code, § 1567 et seq., the daughter is entitled to have the release set aside.

OLNEY, J. From a judgment against her in an action to quiet title to an undivided one-half interest in certain real property, the plaintiff appeals.

The defendant is the surviving husband of one Eva Brode, deceased, and the plaintiff is Eva Brode's daughter by a former marriage. Eva Brode died intestate, leaving as her heirs only the plaintiff and the defendant. Her estate apparently was not administered upon. At the time of her death the record title to the property, which is the subject of the action, stood in the name of herself and her husband as tenants in common, having been conveyed by deed to them as joint grantees. The plaintiff claims that the property was in fact the separate property of her mother, so that she as her heir is the owner of a one-half interest therein. The defendant, on the other hand, claims that it was all community property, so that upon his wife's death he became the absolute owner. The issue so presented is the primary issue in the case.

There is also a secondary issue turning on the validity or invalidity of a release of all her interest in her mother's estate given by the plaintiff to the defendant shortly after her mother's death. The plaintiff claims that this release is invalid for fraud and want of consideration.

The court found against the plaintiff upon both issues, and the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the findings is questioned.

[1, 2] The property in controversy was acquired by the decedent and her husband during marriage in trade for a ranch known as Lugo ranch. This ranch had been acquired shortly after the decedent's marriage to the defendant, and most, if not all, of the consideration given for it was property owned by her before marriage, and unquestionably her separate property. The testimony of the defendant is not entirely clear, but, according to it, some apparently, of the consideration was furnished by him. But however this may be, the deed by which the ranch was acquired conveyed it to the decedent as sole grantee, and described it as her separate property, and was so made with the consent of her husband, who participated in the transaction. This definitely establishes the character of the property as her separate property.

In McComb v. Spangler, 71 Cal. 418, 12 Pac. 347, it was held that where a third person conveys property to a wife as her separate property there is but a prima facie presumption that it is taken by her as such. This may be true where, as in that case, it does not appear that the deed was made with the husband's consent. But where, although the property is purchased with community funds, it is conveyed to the wife with the husband's consent by a deed expressly describing it as her separate estate, it is as if the husband himself had conveyed community property to her by deed expressing that she took it as her separate estate. Such a conveyance would be nothing more nor less than an express gift by the husband to the wife of community property. Swain v. Duane, 48 Cal. 358; Shanahan v. Crampton, 92 Cal. 9, 28 Pac. 50.

There is no impediment to a husband making such a gift if he desires, and if he does it the property at once becomes the wife's separate property, and the effect of the conveyance in this respect cannot be avoided except by avoiding the conveyance itself. This, of course, cannot be done except for fraud, mistake, or some similar ground. In the absence of some such ground for setting aside the transaction it is wholly immaterial that the property was community property before the husband conveyed it to the wife, or, in case it were conveyed to her by a third person, that the consideration given for it was community property. Its character is changed at once by the conveyance to the wife as her separate property either by the husband directly or by a third person with his consent.

Furthermore, except for the purpose of showing fraud or some other ground for setting aside the transaction, evidence that the husband did not intend that the property should become the wife's separate property is wholly inconsequential, since such evidence is but a denial of his intent as expressed in the deed, and that expression of intent is final. Such evidence, in fact, is nothing less than an attempt to avoid the legal consequences of what the husband actually did, but without setting aside what he did. As long as what he did stands, its legal consequences stand with it. In the present case no element of fraud or other ground for setting aside the act of the defendant in permitting the Lugo ranch to be conveyed to his wife as her separate property appears or is claimed, and it must therefore be taken that the decedent acquired and held the ranch as her separate property.

[3] We have stated that the property in controversy was acquired by exchange for the Lugo ranch. If this were all, the conclusion would be inevitable, from the fact that the latter was the decedent's separate property, that the former was such also. But the question is complicated by two additional circumstances. One is that with the consent of the decedent it was taken, not in her name alone, but in the name of herself and her husband; and the other is that the Lugo ranch was not the entire consideration given. A part of the consideration was the assumption of a mortgage on the property for $3,600, and this was paid off with funds from the joint bank account of the decedent and her husband. Into this bank account went funds which were undoubtedly separate funds of the decedent and also funds of her husband. The deposit card signed by both the parties and given to the bank when the account was opened specifies that the account is opened and held by the depositors in joint ownership, with full right of survivorship. The defendant also testified that such was the understanding in regard to the account between himself and his wife.

It is true that withdrawals from this account for the purpose of making payments on the mortgage followed closely in nearly every instance, if not in all, the deposit in the account of moneys which the decedent had received from an inheritance, and were therefore her separate property. But, even so, we do not see our way clear to hold that the implied finding of the trial court that this account and the moneys withdrawn from it and used to pay the mortgage mentioned were community property is not sustained by the evidence. The wife's separate funds were mingled in the account with community property, and possibly with separate property of the husband. The evidence justifies the conclusion that the parties looked upon the account as a common one. The inference cannot unfairly be drawn that they considered it as a community account. If they did, and the decedent chose to deposit her separate funds in it, those funds took the character of the account. The case is quite different from Denigan v. Hibernia, etc., Society, 127 Cal. 137, 59 Pac. 389, where an account in the joint names of a husband and wife was held to be the separate property of the latter it appearing that it was made up exclusively of her funds, and that there was no evidence whatever of any understanding that the account itself was not her separate property other than the fact that it was in the joint names of herself and her husband. In view, then, of the implied finding of the court, it must be taken that the mortgage on the property in controversy, which was assumed as part of the consideration given for it, was paid off with community funds; in other words, that the property was acquired in part with community funds.

[4] The final situation, then, is that the real estate in controversy was purchased partly with separate funds or estate of the decedent and partly with community funds, and was taken in the name of both the decedent and her husband. We can see but one conclusion that can be rationally drawn from these facts, and that is that the one-half interest which the conveyance on its face operated to convey to the decedent was taken and held by her as her separate estate, and that the other half was taken and held by her husband as community property. Such was the presumption on the face of the deed (section 164, Civ. Code; Pabst v. Shearer, 172 Cal. 239, 156 Pac. 466), and, assuming as we must, in view of the finding of the court, that the funds taken from the joint bank account to pay off the mortgage assumed as part of the purchase price were community funds, the presumption is borne out rather than contradicted by the evidence. Plaintiff's counsel claim that even the one-half interest appearing in the defendant on the face of the deed must be taken to have been the decedent's separate estate, relying in support of their position upon Shaw v. Bernal, 163 Cal. 262, 124 Pac. 1012. But in that case the property was purchased entirely with separate funds of the wife, and there were circumstances justifying the conclusion that the husband took the title as trustee for her. Nothing of this sort appears here. The finding of the trial court, then, that the property was entirely community property, is supported by the evidence as to the one-half interest acquired in the name of the defendant, and is not supported by the evidence as to the other half acquired in the name of the plaintiff's mother. On the contrary, the evidence shows affirmatively and unmistakably that this latter half was separate property.

The conclusion so reached necessitates a consideration of the second issue in the case, that as to the validity of the release given the defendant by the plaintiff of all her interest in her mother's estate. The release was executed shortly after the decedent's death, and states that in consideration of $10 paid her the plaintiff releases all claim in any estate of her mother. The actual fact of the matter is also, according to the defendant's testimony, that the plaintiff received at the time but $10. The defendant had previously given her $125, but apparently by way of gift. But whether the consideration was but the $10, or was the $10 plus the $125 previously given, it is perfectly evident that it was practically no consideration at all, if the plaintiff and defendant were aware of the fact that as her mother's heir she was the owner of at least a one-half interest in the one-half of the property which stood in her mother's name.

Assuming the defendant's story as to the consideration given to be correct, the transaction is yet explainable as a rational transaction only upon one or the other of three possibilities—either that the release was really intended as a gift, or that there was a dispute or question between the parties as to their respective rights which the plaintiff was willing to settle for a nominal consideration, or that it was made upon the supposition that the plaintiff had no rights in any of the property which formerly belonged to her mother, and the release was given merely by way of confirmation of the defendant's rights. The possibility that the release was intended as a gift is negatived by all the evidence, and no claim is made by the defendant that the release was so intended. As to the second possibility, it would, of course, be extremely unlikely that, if there had been any serious question as to the plaintiff having a substantial interest in the property, she would be willing to forego that possible interest for a nominal consideration of $10, or, at most, $135. But, however this may be, the evidence of the defendant himself shows that the third possibility is the true explanation of the giving of the release, and that it was given upon the supposition that the plaintiff had no interest in any property of her mother, but that the defendant had acquired it all.

[5] It seems that the defendant and the decedent, some time before the latter's death, had each executed a deed to the other and placed it in their safe deposit box, upon the understanding that upon the death of one the survivor would take all the property by the deed of the one dying, and the deed of the survivor would not take effect. The transaction, in other words, was exactly that passed upon in Kenney v. Parks, 125 Cal. 146, 57 Pac. 772, and there held wholly ineffective. Upon the death of his wife, the defendant the next day obtained the deed by her and had it recorded. Thereafter, according to the defendant's testimony, the plaintiff asked him if her mother had left a will, and he replied "No," and that she had given him a deed to her property, and did not leave any property. Several days later the plaintiff and defendant had a further conversation, in which the defendant again made practically the same statement, and asked the plaintiff to sign an agreement in order that he might have no difficulty with his title. This she agreed to do, and the release was executed in accordance with the understanding so arrived at. It is plain enough from these facts, which appear from the testimony of the defendant himself, that the release was given in reliance upon his statement that the plaintiff's mother had conveyed all her property to him, and left nothing as a part of her estate.

[6] The plaintiff's account of the giving of the release is different from that of the defendant. It is that the $10 or the $135 which she received for it, as the case may be, was not the sole or even the moving consideration. The moving consideration, according to her statement, was the execution by the defendant of deeds in the plaintiff's favor, to be delivered to her upon his death in case he died before her. Such deeds were executed, that is, executed in the sense that they were signed and acknowledged by the defendant. They were not delivered, however, and were subsequently destroyed by the defendant. The deeds were, of course, wholly invalid for want of a delivery, and if they were in fact the moving consideration for the plaintiff's release there was such a failure of consideration for the release as would invalidate it.

The defendant denies that the deeds just mentioned were executed as the consideration for the release, and in view of the findings of the court we must take it that they were not. But if they were not, then the sole consideration for the release was either $10 or $135, as testified to by the defendant, and the only rational explanation of the transaction which can be discerned from the evidence is, as we have said, that the release was given in reliance upon the defendant's statement that the plaintiff's mother had conveyed all her property to him and had left no estate.

[7] This statement, in view of the findings against fraud, we must take to have been made by the defendant honestly and in the belief that it was true. But even so, the release was invalid. The statement was not true, and it went to a fact which, in the very nature of things, must have been the basis of the transaction between the parties. If the defendant knew the statement was false, there was gross fraud. If he believed it to be true, there was yet a mistake concurred in by him, as well as by the plaintiff, and affecting the fundamental basis upon which they were dealing. Such a mistake invalidates a transaction into which it enters, and the plaintiff was entitled to have the release set aside. Section 1567 et seq., Civ. Code. It follows that upon the merits of the case, construing the evidence in the light most favorable to the defendant, the plaintiff was yet the owner of one-half of the one-half interest which stood in her mother's name, and should have had judgment so declaring.

There is, however, a difficulty in reversing the judgment against her. It arises upon the pleadings. The plaintiff's complaint does not allege mistake; it does not even allege that the release was given in reliance upon the untrue statement of the defendant—either honestly or dishonestly made—that the decedent had conveyed her property to him, and left nothing. It alleges fraud and want of consideration, but the facts alleged as sustaining these allegations are that the release was given in consideration of the defendant's promise to execute deeds which would give the property to the plaintiff upon his death, and that this promise was both fraudulent and had been repudiated. These allegations were denied by the defendant's answer, and the court must be taken to have found them to be untrue. In other words, the situation is one wherein the plaintiff sought to set aside the release because of certain facts alleged by her to exist, where the defendant denied the existence of those facts, where the parties went to trial and the court found that the facts alleged by the plaintiff did not exist, but where the only evidence that they did not exist is the testimony of the defendant, which, while it showed a different state of facts from that alleged by the plaintiff, yet showed one upon which she was entitled to exactly the same relief.

If plaintiff's counsel, after the defendant testified, had asked leave to amend their pleadings by adding allegations in conformity with the defendant's story, they would have been entitled to it, and, had it been refused, there would be no difficulty in reversing the judgment. But this they did not do, and the result is that the complaint does not allege the facts upon which, and upon which alone, in view of the court's findings, she may set aside her release and have relief. On the other hand, the case was manifestly tried by both sides, and determined by the court upon the theory that there was a direct conflict between the stories of the plaintiff and the defendant—as there was—and according as this conflict was determined judgment should be given—as was not the case.

It is also to be said that the court's findings of want of fraud must have been based in large part upon its erroneous finding that none of the property was the separate property of the plaintiff's mother. If it had not been for this erroneous conclusion as to the character of the property, the issue as to the defendant's fraud in securing the release and the evidence bearing upon that issue would have presented themselves to the court in a very different aspect, and the findings as to want of fraud might have been quite different. There was little ground for questioning the release if the property were community property and the plaintiff had no interest in it. There was strong ground for questioning it if it were her mother's separate property, and she had an interest in it; ground so strong that it is hardly possible that the release would have been valid. We think it quite evident that the erroneous finding of the court that the property was community property was, in the final analysis of the case, the real foundation for the judgment against the plaintiff, and, in fact, the only foundation for it, and that because of it the judgment should be reversed.

Judgment reversed, with leave to the parties to amend their pleadings if they so desire.

HEVENER v. FRANKLIN et ux. (Civ. 3271.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. May 11, 1921.)

1. Pleading ⟸35—Complaint for nondelivery held to allow recovery notwithstanding unsupported charge of fraud.

The complaint being otherwise sufficient as one for damages for breach of a contract of sale by failure to deliver part of the enumerated articles, right of recovery is not affected by the unnecessary charge of fraudulent misrepresentation unsupported by the evidence.

2. Pleading ⟸127(2)—Nondelivery of articles sold held shown by admissions of answer and evidence.

The bill of sale given by defendant to plaintiff enumerating among other things sold, "beds complete, 22; couches, 12; * * * blankets, 45," the complaint enumerating among other articles not delivered "22 beds complete" and "45 blankets," described as two separate and distinct items sold, the answer admitting sale to plaintiff of all the articles enumerated in the complaint, and defendant testifying that by "bed complete" was meant several articles, including two blankets, and that there were in the building, when turned over to plaintiff but 45 blankets and 20 beds, there was sufficient showing of sale of 89 blankets, and failure to deliver 44 of them.

3. Pleading ⟸377—Plaintiff not required to give proof of value alleged in verified complaint and not denied in answer.

The complaint for failure of defendant to deliver certain secondhand articles sold being duly verified, and alleging specifically in dollars and cents the reasonabe value of each article sold, and none of such allegations of value being denied by the answer, plaintiff was not required to offer any proof as to value.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Russ Avery, Judge.

Action by W. A. Hevener against J. R. Franklin and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

A. K. Hancock, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

C. W. Hall, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

FINLAYSON, P. J. Defendants executed a bill of sale whereby they sold to plaintiff, for the sum of $4,250, certain personal property, the description of which in the bill of sale, in so far as is necessary to an understanding of this case, is as follows:

"That certain personal property situated and located in the building known and designated as No. 106 Magnolia avenue, Long Beach, Cal., and three cottages in the rear, described as follows: Beds complete, 22; sanitary couches, 12; * * * blankets, 45."

Claiming that defendants had failed to deliver all the articles itemized in the bill of sale (that instrument enumerates many more than those above set forth by us), plaintiff brought this action to recover the reasonable value of such of the articles as he claimed were not delivered. Judgment passed for defendants, and plaintiff appeals.

[1] Instead of simply suing to recover damages for breach of contract arising out of defendants' failure to deliver the goods as agreed, appellant, for some inscrutable re-son, unnecessarily charged respondents with fraudulent misrepresentation, by alleging that the latter falsely and fraudulently represented to him that the furniture and furnishings situated in the apartment house and cottages included all the articles that were itemized in the bill of sale. There seems to have been no substantial basis for any charge of fraud, and the trial court very properly, we think, found against appellant's allegations of fraudulent misrepresentations. But though appellant was not justified in making fraud the basis of his right of recovery, he was entitled to recover damages for breach of contract, if, as the complaint alleges, respondents failed to deliver all of the articles as agreed. His complaint, though inartificially drawn, contains allegations which, if true, are sufficient to entitle him to recover the reasonable value of the undelivered articles, and the judgment must be reversed, unless, as respondents claim, appellant failed to prove certain allegations essential to a cause of action for breach of respondents' contract to deliver the missing articles. The claim is that appellant failed to show: (1) That all the property listed in the bill of sale was not delivered: and, (2) the value of any of the articles which it is claimed were not delivered.

[2] Among the articles enumerated in the bill of sale are, as we have pointed out, "beds complete, 22" and "blankets, 45." All the witnesses seem to have agreed that the words "beds complete" include two blankets on each bed, or, as one of the witnesses naively put it, "a 'bed complete' is just as you would go to bed in it, with two sheets, two blankets, two slips, two pillows, a spring, and a bedstead." The respondent J. R. Franklin, upon being asked what he meant and intended by a "bed complete" answered: "I intended two sheets, two slips, two blankets, two pillows, two pillowcases, a mattress, springs, and bedstead." His wife, the other defendant, testified that by the words "bed complete" is meant "the amount on the bed, * * * two sheets, two slips, two pillows, two blankets, mattress, bedstead, and springs." From this it follows that the two items listed in the bill of sale as "beds complete, 22," and "blankets, 45," call for an aggregate of 89 blankets. Respondent J. R. Franklin testified that there were in the cottages and apartment house when turned over to appellant but 45 blankets and 20 beds. This alone, without considering any of the other articles alleged to have been undelivered, suffices to show a failure to deliver all of the articles enumerated in the bill of sale.

Shortly after taking possession of the apartment house and cottages, appellant, according to the testimony of himself and wife, compared the furniture and furnishings then in the buildings with the listed articles enumerated in the bill of sale and made a memorandum of such of the articles described in the bill of sale as they were unable to find—a memorandum of "shortage," as they termed the missing or undelivered articles. At the trial they were unable to say just what articles had been actually delivered, and could only testify as to these "shortages." It is claimed by respondents that, since the construction of the bill of sale and particularly of the words "beds complete," was a matter solely for the court, appellant should have shown just what articles actually were delivered, and that it was for the court to conclude from such testimony what, if any, were the "shortages." But, as we already have shown, respondents' testimony leaves no room to doubt that there was a failure to deliver 2 beds and about 44 blankets, to say nothing of the other articles that appellant claims were not delivered. Moreover, appellant's complaint itemizes the various articles which he claims respondents sold to him, but failed to deliver. Among the articles that the complaint thus enumerates as among the undelivered are the items "22 beds complete" and "45 blankets"—described in the complaint as two separate and wholly distinct items sold, but not delivered. Respondents in their answer admit having sold to appellant all of the articles so enumerated by him in his complaint. If, therefore, a "bed complete" calls for two blankets on the bed, as testified to by respondents themselves, then it follows from the admissions in the pleadings that the bill of sale called for a total of 89 blankets, while but 45 in all were delivered to appellant, according to respondents' own testimony.

[3] Instead of proving the reasonable value of the missing articles as secondhand goods, appellant's witnesses testified what would be the cost of similar articles if purchased new. Because there is no direct evidence of the reasonable value of the articles as used or secondhand goods—they had been in use by respondents and their predecessors for a long time prior to the sale—respondents claim that appellant failed to sustain his allegation of damages, and that for that reason alone the judgment should be affirmed. But there was no issue as to the reasonable value of the undelivered articles. Appellant's complaint, duly verified, alleges specifically, in dollars and cents, the reasonable value of each missing article. None of these allegations of value is denied by the answer. Consequently appellant was not required to offer any proof as to value.

NATIONAL CITY BANK v. CHUBB. (Civ. 3276.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. May 19, 1921.)

Corporations ⇐268(1)—Date debt was incurred must be alleged in an action against a stockholder on corporate notes.

As Civ. Code, § 322, provides that the liability of each stockholder is determined by the amount of stock or shares owned by him at the time the debt or liability was incurred, it is necessary, in an action against a stockholder on corporate notes, to allege the date on which the original indebtedness was incurred, for the action is not based on the notes, but on the debt itself, and the fact that the plaintiff was a bona fide holder for value is immaterial.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Bernardino County; Rex B. Goodcell, Judge.

Action by the National City Bank, a corporation, against Mont P. Chubb. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Reversed, with directions.

Edgar G. Pratt and Janeway & Beach, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

William J. Palmer, of Los Angeles, and Grant Holcomb, of San Bernardino, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. This is an action to enforce the liability of certain stockholders in the Mont P. Chubb Drug Company. A general demurrer was interposed by the defendant, Mont P. Chubb, which was overruled. Thereupon an answer was filed. On the trial, the defendant introduced no evidence. The appeal is based upon the judgment roll alone.

The action is upon two promissory notes. The complaint alleges that the plaintiff purchased them for a valuable consideration, and before maturity, and it states the date upon which the notes were made, but contains no allegation as to the date on which the original indebtedness was incurred. There is ample authority for the proposition that, in an action under section 322 of the Civil Code, it is necessary to allege the date upon which the debt or liability was incurred. J. J. Case Plow Works v. Montgomery, 115 Cal. 380, 47 Pac. 108; Winona Wagon Co. v. Bull, 108 Cal. 1, 40 Pac. 1077; Hunt v. Ward, 99 Cal. 612, 34 Pac. 335, 37 Am. St. Rep. 87. Section 322 of the Civil Code provides that the—

"liability of each stockholder is determined by the amount of stock or shares owned by him at the time the debt or liability was incurred."

In Hunt v. Ward, the action was on a promissory note, and was brought by the payee. The date of the making of the note was alleged, but not the date on which the original indebtedness was incurred. The court there pointed out that a promissory note might not represent the original debt or liability which might have been contracted before the defendant became a stockholder. In both of the other cases, supra (the respective notes were sued upon), the decisions are based upon Hunt v. Ward, supra, and its reasoning.

In the case at bar, the plaintiff is not the payee, but a bona fide holder in due course. Appellant insists that therefore, as to him, the note, being negotiable, is the primary obligation. This might be true as against the corporation, although it is not necessary for us to decide that point here, because the action is one against the defendants as stockholders. As such, they are not parties to the notes executed by the corporation and have no responsibility thereon. Winona Wagon Co. v. Bull, supra. Their liability exists only by reason of the statute. In order that the complaint may state a cause of action against the defendants under the statute, it must allege that the defendants were members of the corporation when the debt was incurred, for the stockholder's liability is upon the debt, and not upon the promise of the corporation as evidenced by the notes.

The judgment is reversed, and the superior court instructed to sustain the demurrer, with permission to plaintiff to amend the complaint.

BEEBE v. KISTLER. (Civ. 3373.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. May 4, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 30, 1921.)

Brokers ⇐82(1)—Complaint for commissions must allege license.

Complaint in an action to recover a broker's commission for a sale of real property must allege that plaintiff was duly licensed at the time his cause of action arose, as required by St. 1919, p. 1259, § 20.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; Z. B. West, Judge.

Action by Bird V. Beebe against S. Kistler. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed in the District Court of Appeals, and hearing denied in Supreme Court.

H. V. Weisel, of Anaheim, for appellant.

Tipton & Cailor, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WORKS, J. This is an action to recover a broker's commission for a sale of real property. Judgment went for plaintiff, and the defendant appeals.

An act of the Legislature passed in 1919 (Stats. 1919, p. 1252) created a state real estate department, and provides for the issuance thereby of licenses to real estate brokers and real estate salesmen. Section 20 of the enactment denies to any broker or salesman the right to bring or maintain any action for the collection of commissions for sales of real property, without alleging that he was duly licensed under the law at the time his cause of action arose. The statute has been held constitutional. Riley v. Chambers, 181 Cal. 589, 185 Pac. 855, 8 A. L. R. 418.

The agreement under which respondent claims to have earned his commission from appellant was made two months after the statute went into effect; but his amended complaint, upon which the action was tried, does not contain the allegation required by section 20. Appellant contends for a reversal of the judgment on the ground that the pleading is defective in that respect.

The judgment is reversed, and, as it is apparent from his brief that respondent cannot truthfully aver the possession of the license required by the statute, the cause is remanded, with directions to the trial court to dismiss the action.

We concur: FINLAYSON, P. J.; CRAIG, J.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. The application for a hearing in this court after decision by the District Court of Appeal of the Second Appellate District, Division Two, is denied.

In denying the application, however, we wish to note that no claim appears to have been made in the case, or in any of the briefs, that the provision of the act creating a state real estate department, and providing for the licensing of real estate brokers, etc. (Stats. 1919, p. 1252), relative to the form of pleading in an action by a broker or salesman for commissions and requiring him to allege in his claim that he was duly licensed, is invalid, in the light of the provision of our Constitution prohibiting special legislation regulating the practice of courts of justice. We therefore have not considered this constitutional question.

All concur.

CONREY, P. J. [1] Respondent moves that the court strike from the files the transcript on appeal herein on the ground that it is not the transcript on appeal provided for by the Code of Civil Procedure, "and is not a transcript corrected as provided by the rules" of this court. The argument for this motion proceeds upon the circumstance that after the clerk's transcript and the reporter's transcript had been forwarded by the clerk of the superior court to the clerk of the Supreme Court, and before they were filed in the office of the clerk of the Supreme Court, where the appeal was then pending, the clerk of the Supreme Court permitted the attorneys for appellant to withdraw the transcripts for the purpose of having them further certified before filing. This was done two successive times before the transcripts were filed. It is not claimed that the transcripts were modified other than by the addition of further certificates. Sufficient grounds for a motion to strike the transcripts from the files do not appear.

[2] Alternative to the motion above noted, respondent further moves for an order striking from the transcript certain described portions thereof. This motion is made upon the ground that such portions of the record are not provided for or authorized by law, and are in violation of sections 953a and 953c of the Code of Civil Procedure, and of the rules of the Supreme Court. From the context of the statement as contained in the notice of motion, we assume that by "the transcript" respondent refers to the "reporter's transcript."

The judgment described in the notice of appeal is a judgment based upon findings of fact pertinent to the plaintiff's alleged cause of action and upon plaintiff's default for not answering defendant's cross-complaint. Affirmative relief was granted to defendant upon his cross-complaint. From the minutes of the court, it appears that after the default of plaintiff for failure to appear after service upon him of the cross-complaint had been entered, the plaintiff on June 23, 1919, moved that said default be set aside, and that he be permitted to plead to said cross-complaint; and that on February 16, 1920, said motion was denied. The reporter's transcript consists of an original transcript, purporting to contain the proceedings at the trial, and to which is annexed a supplement the contents of which are noted on the cover thereof as being "all papers, records and files in the above-entitled action not included in the judgment roll therein." This reporter's transcript and supplement are indorsed "Filed by the clerk of the superior court October 25, 1920." The supplement contains pages numbered 1 to 76. On March 4, 1921, the judge certified the original transcript in due form as a true transcript of the proceedings at the trial, and further certified that the contents of the first 24 pages of the supplement were copies of certain writings offered in evidence at the trial. The pages thus specified are unrelated to the order refusing to set aside default. The proceedings which appellant seeks to have recognized as relating to the motion to set aside default are those contained on and following page 26 of the supplement. The only certificate of the judge which touches any of these proceedings is dated February 24, 1921, being now the last page of the supplement. Therein he certifies that on pages 31 to 59 (both pages inclusive) are set forth full and correct copies of certain documents which in the certificate are described by their titles. The certificate contains no statement that any of said documents were used or considered in connection with the motion to vacate and set aside default, or at all. The notice of motion itself is contained on pages 31 and 32. This notice, after stating the motion to be made and the grounds thereof, states that—

"Said motion will be based upon the notice of motion, the proposed demurrer, motion to strike and answer, upon the affidavits of N. C. Folsom, C. F. Wren, and upon oral and documentary evidence adduced at the hearing of said motion and upon the papers, pleadings and files in the above-entitled action."

The certificate of February 24, 1921, last above mentioned, is insufficient to authorize the inclusion in the transcript of any portion of said pages 31 to 59, except possibly pages 31 and 32, which contain the notice of motion. The affidavits which follow and the proposed answer to cross-complaint may or may not have been used on the presentation of the motion, and they may or may not have constituted all of the evidence produced at that hearing.

The burden is upon appellant to show that the decision of the court below was erroneous. "This can only be shown by the record of the proceedings which has been brought before us. An appellate tribunal cannot take judicial knowledge of proceedings in lower courts. It can only act upon the record of the proceedings authenticated in the mode required by law." Nash v. Harris, 57 Cal. 242.

In Waymire v. Calif. Trona Co., 176 Cal. 395, 398, 168 Pac. 563, 565, the Supreme Court said:

"It has long been settled, with regard to the affidavits used on a motion, that they must be identified and authenticated by the trial judge before they can be considered by this court. The certificate of the clerk cannot take the place of the authentication by the judge. * * * This rule is now so well established that any further discussion of it is unnecessary. The same rule must be applied in cases arising under section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure."

It appearing, therefore, that the matters contained on pages 33 to 59, inclusive, of the supplement to reporter's transcript have not been so certified as to be entitled to place in the record, we are of the opinion that as to those pages, unless adequate correction can be made, the motion should be granted. The matters contained on pages 25 to 30, inclusive, and pages 60 to 76, of the supplement, being entirely excluded from the certificates made by the judge, should likewise be stricken from the transcript and supplement. Counsel for appellant have requested that, in the event that the court should consider the authentication of these documents incomplete, then appellant be authorized to withdraw the transcript for the purpose of securing further authentication (if it meet with the approval of the trial judge) as to the matter so held to be insufficiently authenticated. It is uncertain whether the defects in certification are due to inadvertence or design on the part of the trial judge. It is for him, by his certificate, to say, if he can, that the documents offered to him for certification were actually used in the proceedings to which they refer. Appellants are granted leave to withdraw the reporter's transcript and supplement from the files and to refile the same, with such additional certification as the trial judge may be willing to affix thereto. In the event of a failure to thus present, within 30 days, a proper record, conforming to the views herein expressed, those portions of the supplement of the reporter's transcript hereinabove specified as being insufficiently certified will be, and without further order will be deemed to be, stricken therefrom.

RICH et al. v. CONNELLY et al., Board of County Sup'rs. (Civ. 2297.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 7, 1921. As modified May 16, 1921.)

1. Waters and water courses ⟸225—Petition basis of proceedings for formation of irrigation district.

Under Irrigation Law, § 2, as it stood when the particular proceedings in issue were had, the petition for formation of an irrigation district constituted the basis of all proceedings, all else being merely evidentiary and procedural; the setting of the hearing on the report of the state engineer not being mandatory.

2. Waters and water courses ⟸225—Jurisdiction of formation of irrigation district unaffected by time of filing engineer's report.

Under Irrigation Law, § 2, on petition for formation of an irrigation district, recommendations contained in the state engineer's report, dated January 13, 1921, were not too late for consideration because not filed within 90 days after submission to him of the copy of the resolution adopted by the county board of supervisors October 4, 1920, particularly in view of section 3; such matter not affecting the right of the board to proceed.

Application for writ of prohibition, by Geary Rich and another against W. B. Connelly and others, being and constituting the Board of Supervisors of the County of Solano, State of California, to prevent the formation of an irrigation district. Writ denied.

McWilliams & Hatfield, L. A. Hilborn and Robbins, Elkins & Van Fleet, all of San Francisco, for petitioners.

Gregory & Goodell, of San Francisco, and Arthur Lindauer, of Vallejo, for respondents.

PLUMMER, Presiding Justice pro tem. Application for writ of prohibition. On the 4th day of October, 1920, a petition was filed with the board of supervisors of Solano county, having for its purpose the formation of an irrigation district to be known as Suisun irrigation district. On the same day the board of supervisors of said county passed its resolution, wherein and whereby it appears that the board found and determined that the petition for the formation of said district complied in all particulars with the law, had been properly advertised, and contained the requisite number of genuine signatures. On October 6 a copy of this resolution was forwarded to the state engineer. On November 24, 1920, the state engineer reported adversely to the board of supervisors, which report was received and filed by the clerk of said board on the 26th day of said month. On December 6, 1920, being the first regular meeting of the board of supervisors following the receipt of the state engineer's report, there was a general continuance of all matters pertaining to said petition until Monday, January 3, 1921. On January 3, 1921, there was another general continuance until January 17. In the meantime, and on the 13th day of January, 1921, the state engineer addressed a communication to the board of supervisors containing recommendations with respect to the boundaries of said district. On the 17th of January the board of supervisors met and adopted a resolution determining to modify the plans of the district to conform to the recommendations of the state engineer contained in his communication of January 13th, set the final hearing of the petition for the formation of the district for Friday, February 4, 1921, and directed notice thereof to be published as required by law. The matter went to final hearing before the board on February 4, and was continued to Monday, February 7, on which latter date it was again continued until February 9. On the 9th day of February, 1921, further proceedings were intercepted by an alternative writ of prohibition served herein. The petitioners herein contend that by reason of the fact that the board of supervisors did not at its meeting on the 6th day of December, 1920, set a time for the consideration of the adverse report submitted to it by the state engineer, jurisdiction to further proceed in the consideration of the petition for the formation of the district was thereby lost; that the provisions of section 2 of the irrigation law of this state (St. 1917, p. 754) in reference to consideration of such report are mandatory. The section, at the time the foregoing proceedings were being had, read as follows:

"'Upon receiving a copy of said resolution, the state engineer shall make or cause to be made such preliminary investigation as may be practicable, with a view to determining the feasibility of the project proposed to be undertaken. He shall report as soon as practicable, but at all events within ninety days, in writing, on the matter to the board of supervisors from which the copy of said resolution was received, and such board of supervisors at their next regular meeting following the receipt of said report, shall set a time for the consideration of said report; provided, that such time shall not be less than one week from such regular meeting of said board of supervisors; and provided, further, that notice of such time shall be given by registered mail to such party as shall have been designated for that purpose by the petitioners or by publication for at least three days in one daily newspaper published in the county in which the lands within the proposed district, or the greater portion thereof, are situated. A failure to give such last-mentioned notice, however, shall not affect the validity of subsequent proceedings."

It is further provided in the same section that—

"If the state engineer shall report that the supply of water available for the use of the proposed district * * * is not sufficient or that the project is not feasible for any * * * reason, and if such report is filed with said board of supervisors before the expiration of ninety days, * * * the hearing of the petition shall again be continued for not more than two months and shall then be dismissed, unless the board of supervisors shall be petitioned in writing by three-fourths of the holders of title or evidence of title * * * within the proposed district."

It is also further provided that if the board of supervisors, "after receiving an adverse report from the state engineer," shall "decide to modify the plans as set forth in said petition or shall be requested in writing, by three-fourths in number of the holders of title" so to do, it may proceed to a final hearing of said matter.

The amended section dealing with the foregoing matters, but withheld by referendum and not in effect on the 6th day of December, 1920, omits all reference to setting a time for hearing the report of the state engineer. It does, however, contain all the requirements relating to a continuance of the hearing of the petition in the event of an adverse report.

It will be noted that section 2 of the act referred to is entirely silent on the subject of the board of supervisors making any finding or adopting any resolution determining the character of the report of the state engineer. This report, it would seem from a careful reading of the section, is for the purpose of guiding the board of supervisors and directing the final action that shall be taken. The board of supervisors apparently is not called upon or directed, even if the language of the section be held mandatory, to do anything more than set the report of the state engineer for hearing. If mandatory, the hearing must be for the protection of all property owners affected by the proposed district, and, if mandatory, then it would seem that notice of such hearing must be given to the parties interested; but the section provides that failure to give notice "shall not affect the validity of subsequent proceedings."

[1] The section also provides that if the board of supervisors shall determine that the petitioners have complied with the requirements hereinbefore set forth, they shall cause a copy of the resolution so declaring to be forwarded to the state engineer, and shall postpone further hearing of said petition until a report shall be received from the state engineer. The state engineer is then given 90 days to make a preliminary investigation and report. If his report is adverse, it is the hearing of the petition that must be continued for a period not exceeding two months. The foundation of the proceeding is the petition signed by the property owners of the district and filed with the board of supervisors. It is the hearing of the petition that must be continued in the event of an adverse report, and the final proceedings on the petition are to be determined by the character of the report and the subsequent action of the property owners. It does not appear that by the adoption of the section referred to the legislature intended that the report of the state engineer should constitute anything more than a piece of evidence, conclusive in its character, by which the board of supervisors should be governed in its action, and by which the landowners of the district might be governed in their action in relation to the boundaries of the district, and the subsequent granting or denial of the petition upon which the board of supervisors were called upon to act by the property owners in the first instance. In other words, it is the petition which constitutes the basis of all the proceedings. That is the substance; all else is evidentiary and procedural. If the Legislature intended that the setting of the hearing upon the report of the state engineer were mandatory, it is hardly probable that it would have provided also, in the event of a failure to give such notice, the validity of the proceedings would not be thereby affected.

[2] It is further contended that the recommendations contained in the state engineer's report bearing date January 13, 1921, were too late for consideration because not filed within 90 days after submission to him of the copy of the resolution adopted by the board on the 4th day of October previously. This, however, does not seem to affect the right of the board to proceed. The section in this particular reads as follows:

"If said board shall, after receiving an adverse report from the state engineer, as aforesaid, decide to modify the plans as set forth in said petition, or shall be requested, in writing, by three-fourths in number of the holders of title or evidence of title, etc., said board shall then proceed * * * to a final hearing of the matter."

The submission or nonsubmission of additional recommendations after making an adverse report does not appear to have any bearing upon the jurisdiction of the board of supervisors to proceed and modify the plans of the district, and there is nothing in the section which can be construed to prohibit the receiving by the board of supervisors of such recommendations in relation to the modification of the boundaries of the district as may to the state engineer seem wise or expedient.

That a hearing on the report of the state engineer is not a jurisdictional matter, that the report is evidentiary, further appears by section 3 of the same act, which upon this subject reads as follows:

"Upon the final hearing of said petition or said matter, the board of supervisors shall make an order reaffirming its conclusions as to the genuineness and sufficiency of the petition and notice hereinbefore provided for, reciting that a report regarding the proposed district has been made by the state engineer, and is on file with the other records of the board, and describing the boundaries of the proposed district as defined and established by said board. Said order shall be entered in full upon the minutes of said board."

It will be noted that this is the only action required by the board of supervisors in its final hearing in relation to the report; that it be referred to as a matter of record, not that the board of supervisors must consider the same and make and enter upon its record any finding as to whether the report of the state engineer is favorable or adverse. There is no such requirement in the irrigation law. After these proceedings have all been had and the board of supervisors has finally passed upon the petition for the formation of an irrigation district, the actual question of the formation of the district must be submitted to the qualified electors thereof.

Again, when it is proposed to raise the money for the acquiring of water, water rights, building canals, reservoirs, and carrying out the purposes of the district, an affirmative vote of the landowners of the district is again required.

It will also be noted that at the time section 2 was in force, in so far as it governed the proceedings hereinbefore referred to, an affirmative vote of two-thirds of the landowners of the district was required either to form the district or to subject it to any liabilities whatsoever. In this particular the irrigation law differs from street assessments, and many other provisions of the law by which a property owner may be called upon to pay taxes, without having the opportunity of himself deciding whether the liability shall or shall not be incurred. In the matter of forming irrigation districts and incurring liabilities, the property owner may not only protest, but he also has the deciding vote.

Section 2, as it now stands amended, eliminates all provision relating to a hearing on the report of the state engineer, indicating that the Legislature considered this matter not one of substance.

From what has been said, it does not seem necessary to review the decisions cited by petitioner, holding that in assessment cases where the property owner has no voice provisions of the law should be held mandatory, where in other cases they might properly be held directory. As sufficient has been stated to indicate that the petition filed by the property owners in the formation of an irrigation district is the basis of jurisdiction, and action thereon throughout the whole proceedings is the jurisdictional matter, and not either the favorable or adverse report of the state engineer further than such report may determine the final action that must be taken by the board of supervisors upon the petition, and not upon any other writing, communication, report, or instrument, we conclude that the petition for a writ of prohibition herein should be denied; and it is so ordered.

JANSEN v. BRYANT et al. (Civ. 3500.)

1. Judgment ⊂⊃384 — Motion for leave to amend answer after judgment amounts to application to vacate.

Where judgment was given for plaintiff on the pleadings, and a motion to amend the answer was presented after judgment, it amounted to an application for relief under Code Civ. Proc. § 473 which provides that on proper cause a court may vacate a judgment.

2. Judgment ⊂⊃391—Affidavit of merits held insufficient.

An affidavit of merits by defendant's attorney on application to vacate judgment, averring that defendant has a good and just defense, but which does not state that the facts of the case have been stated to affiant by defendant, is insufficient.

3. Pleading ⊂⊃121(3)—As to matters within defendant's knowledge, an answer containing verified denial on information and belief is not sufficient.

In an action on verified complaint for goods sold and delivered, the facts alleged in the complaint being presumably within the knowledge of defendant, a verified answer, denying the sale on "information and belief," is not sufficient.

4. Appeal and error ⊂⊃936(1)—In absence of showing by the record, it will be presumed that allowance of costs was correct.

Where no cost bill and no ruling on a motion to strike an allowance of costs from the judgment appear in the record, it will be presumed that all things necessary were done to give the trial court authority to award costs to plaintiff.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; J. A. Allen, Judge.

Action by J. M. Jansen against James Bryant and W. C. Abbott, as partners and individually. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant Bryant appeals. Affirmed.

Max B. Jamison, of Porterville, and J. A. Chase, of Visalia, for appellant.

Evans & Pearce and E. I. Feemster, of Visalia, for respondent.

JAMES, J. In this case the judgment was in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant Bryant, and was given upon a motion based upon the insufficiency of the answer interposed by said defendant. By the complaint it was sought to charge the defendant and his codefendant, as copartners, for the reasonable value of merchandise alleged to have been sold and delivered to them. The complaint was verified. The appellant first answered with an unverified answer, making a general denial. He later filed an amended answer, which was verified. In this answer the only attempt at denial of any issue presented by the complaint was one upon information and belief as to the alleged copartnership relation existing between appellant and his codefendant Abbott.

[1] Upon the filing of this answer plaintiff gave notice of a motion for judgment on the pleadings. Several days later appellant gave notice to the plaintiff that he would apply to the court for leave to amend his answer. The latter motion was noticed for a day subsequent to the day set for the hearing on the motion for judgment on the pleadings. The motion last referred to came on for hearing, and was by the court granted. The motion for leave to amend the answer was later heard, and in support of it was presented an alleged affidavit of merits. Coming as it did after the granting of the motion for judgment on the pleadings, the notice of motion to amend the answer amounted to an application for relief under the provisions of section 473, Code of Civil Procedure.

[2] The affidavit of merits was wholly insufficient to authorize the court to grant the relief. This affidavit was made by the attorney for appellant, and he nowhere stated therein that the facts of the case had been stated to him by the appellant, but contented himself with the statement only "that defendant, James Bryant, has a good and just defense to plaintiff's complaint and cause of action."

[3] But had there been an affidavit of merits sufficient in form, still the amended answer offered to be made would not have been sufficient to raise an issue. By this amended answer appellant offered only to deny on "information and belief" that the merchandise mentioned in the complaint had been sold as alleged. This amendment would have been insufficient for precisely the same reason as justified the court in granting the motion for judgment on the pleadings. All of the matters sought to be so denied were matters which presumably were within the personal knowledge of the appellant, and in that case an answer upon information and belief will not do.

"It has been decided that an allegation of a verified complaint could not be controverted on information and belief when the alleged fact was presumably within the knowledge of the defendant, nor when the defendant had the means of ascertaining whether or not it was true." Mulcahy v. Buckley, 100 Cal. 484, 35 Pac. 144.

"Whether or not the plaintiff had sold and delivered to defendant, at the latter's special instance and request, the property mentioned in the complaint was a matter presumably within the knowledge of defendant, and under the authorities the denial, for want of knowledge or belief on the subject, was insufficient." Raphael Weill & Co. v. Crittenden, 139 Cal. 488, 73 Pac. 238.

[4] Appellant also complains that the court should have, on his motion, stricken from the judgment the allowance of $30.90 costs. He states in his argument that no memorandum of costs was served upon him. Counsel for respondent asserts that a memorandum of costs was served. In the record presented (and it appears to contain everything that counsel for appellant required to be made up and inserted therein) it does not appear whether a cost bill was or was not actually filed, nor whether any ruling was ever made upon the motion of said defendant to have the costs stricken out or the judgment modified in the respect referred to. In such a state of the record we must apply the presumption favoring the regularity of the judgment, and assume that all things were done as required to be done to give the court authority to include the amount of the costs in favor of the plaintiff, as the judgment shows them to be.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. RAMOS. (Cr. 951.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 4, 1921.)

1. Criminal law ⟹1153(6)—Whether diligence has been exercised to secure presence of witness justifying admission of evidence on preliminary examination is within trial court's discretion.

In a criminal prosecution, the question whether sufficient diligence was exercised to procure the attendance of the prosecuting witness, so as to make competent his testimony at the preliminary examination, is one left to the discretion of the trial court, based upon all the facts and circumstances, and it is only in case of abuse of such discretion that a conviction can be reversed for the admission of such evidence.

2. Criminal law ⟹543(2) — Evidence showing absent witness was probably at sea held to sustain admission of testimony at preliminary examination.

A showing by the prosecution that a police officer had made search for the prosecuting witness who could not be found, who was not known to have relatives from whom inquiries could be made, and who was a boat fireman and had stated he was going to sea, held to show that it was not an abuse of the trial court's discretion to receive in evidence the witness' testimony, given at the preliminary examination under the provisions of Pen. Code, § 686.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco, Michael J. Roche, Judge.

Rosendo Ramos was convicted of grand larceny, and he appeals. Affirmed.

J. F. McDonald and W. Wallace Sheehan, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment upon a verdict of conviction of the crime of grand larceny. The motion of the defendant for a new trial was denied.

The point urged upon appeal is that the court erred in allowing the district attorney to read to the jury the transcript of the testimony of the prosecuting witness which was taken in the police court upon the preliminary examination. The respondent contends that the transcript of this testimony was admissible under the provisions of section 686, Penal Code, for the reason that the witness could not be found within the state. The objection by the appellant to the application of said section in the present case is that there was not sufficient showing of diligence on the part of the people to locate the witness and secure his attendance at the trial.

[1] Whether or not there has been due diligence is a question left to the discretion of the trial court based upon all the facts and circumstances, and "it is only in case of an abuse of such discretion that this court would be justified in reversing a criminal case where the judgment was otherwise correct. People v. Witty, 138 Cal. 576, 72 Pac. 177; Renton v. Monnier, 77 Cal. 450, 19 Pac. 820; People v. Melendrez, 4 Cal. App. 399, 88 Pac. 372." People v. Leavens, 12 Cal. App. 178, 106 Pac. 1103.

[2] In the present case, after the jury had been examined and sworn, the district attorney stated in substance that he had just learned that the complaining witness, Aranda, had not been supœnaed, and that he had been informed that he was probably across the bay, and asked that a recess be taken until 2 o'clock to see if this witness could be located. At 2 o'clock Aranda was not produced, but a police officer was placed on the stand, who testified, in effect, that a few days previously he had called at the hotel where Aranda had lived at the time of the commission of the crime, and had been told that he no longer lived there, and that the management of the hotel did not know his address. He then went to see Mr. Rubio, who had acted as interpreter at the preliminary hearing, and inquired of him the whereabouts of Aranda. He was told that Rubio thought Aranda was across the bay, but didn't know exactly where. The police officer also testified that he had been in the police court at the preliminary hearing, and had heard the court inquire of Aranda whether he would be present at the trial, and Aranda had said he was going away on a boat, and that he did not think he would be present at the time of the trial. The police officer also stated that during the recess of the court, he had called at the office of the Chilean consul, who told him that he thought Aranda had gone away on a boat, as he was a fireman and worked on boats, and that he (the Chilean consul) did not know where he was.

Rubio was also examined, and stated that he had gone with the police officer to the Chilean consul, and the consul had stated that Aranda had told him "that he was going on a boat, also that he got a job, but he didn't say where. He got a job on a boat." Rubio also testified that Aranda had stated at the preliminary examination that he wanted to take a trip around on a boat and didn't know how long he would be gone, perhaps five or six months. This witness also testified that he did not know of any relative or any person in any way connected with Aranda who could give any information about him.

It did not appear, therefore, that the police officer had any clue to follow which would lead to a discovery of the whereabouts of this missing witness. The trial court held that the showing was sufficient to permit the reading of the testimony given at the preliminary examination. While the testimony in that transcript was no part of the showing made upon the question of due diligence, it may not be amiss to say that a perusal of it abundantly corroborates the position of the district attorney that Aranda was at sea at the time of the trial.

In the case of People v. Boyd, 16 Cal. App. 130, 133, 134, 116 Pac. 323, 324, the court said:

"As is said in Heintz v. Cooper, 104 Cal. 670, 38 Pac. 512: 'Diligence is a relative term incapable of exact definition. What would amount to due diligence under one state of facts would fall absolutely short of it under another and different state of facts. It depends, therefore, so essentially upon the particular circumstances of each case, with all their distinct and varying phases and bearings, as they have appeared to the lower court at the trial and throughout the conduct of the cause, in determining whether diligence has been used in any particular instance, that this court should hesitate to disturb a ruling upon this ground where it has any substance whatever upon which to rest. The presumption is that the discretion has been properly exercised, and that presumption must be overcome by a clear want of facts before the order will be disturbed.' See Jones v. Singleton, 45 Cal. 92; Baker v. Joseph, 16 Cal. 180; Kenezleber v. Wahl, 92 Cal. 202, 28 Pac. 225; People v. Johnson, 13 Cal. App. 779, 110 Pac. 965."

Under all the circumstances of this case, we think there was no abuse of discretion by the trial court.

The judgment is affirmed.

VAUGHN et al. v. CONDON et al.

(Civ. 3835.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2. California. May 20, 1921.)

1. Execution ⟸22—General provisions do not apply to property of public corporations.

As a matter of public policy, general provisions making property subject to execution, etc., are construed to apply only to property of private persons and corporations, and not to that of public corporations or bodies politic, as municipalities, although Code Civ. Proc. § 710, prescribes the mode of seizing funds due a creditor of a municipal or public corporation.

2. Garnishment ⟸17—Remedy is inapplicable to funds from a municipality.

Garnishment, which is a purely statutory proceeding, is not applicable to funds due from a municipality.

3. Garnishment ⟸17—Funds due defendants from a municipality in a street opening proceeding are not subject to garnishment.

Funds due defendants from a municipality as a result of a street opening proceeding are not subject to garnishment, for the rule of public policy applies, despite the contention that the municipality held the funds as trustee.

4. Garnishment ⟸20—Municipal officers and agents cannot waive rule that property in the hands of municipality is not subject to garnishment.

As the rule that property in the hands of a municipality is not subject to garnishment is one of public policy, it cannot be waived by the failure of the officers of the municipality to object.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Lewis R. Works, Judge.

Action by J. W. Vaughn and others against George W. Condon and A. E. Davies, a copartnership. From an order dissolving an attachment and declaring a garnishment null and void, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Haas & Dunnigan, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

E. V. Rosenkranz, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal from an order dissolving an attachment and declaring a garnishment null and void.

Action was commenced by the plaintiffs against the defendants to recover $5,200 alleged to be due as rent of premises owned by plaintiffs and which were leased to the defendants. A writ of attachment was duly issued, and copies thereof served upon the city treasurer of the city of Los Angeles, and upon the clerk in the street opening department. It appears that the clerk was holding a warrant, payable to the defendants, which was to satisfy a judgment in their favor in a proceeding for opening a street, and that the city treasurer had funds applicable to the payment of such warrant.

The defendants answered the complaint, and made a motion for an order declaring the garnishment null and void, upon the ground that it was of funds due from a municipal corporation, and that the purported garnishment did not comply with the requirements of section 710, Code of Civil Procedure. The motion was granted, and the garnishment declared void.

[1, 2] As a matter of public policy, general provisions making property subject to execution, garnishment, or liens are construed to apply only to property of private persons and corporations, and not to that of public corporations or bodies politic. Skelly v. School District, 103 Cal. 652, 37 Pac. 643; Ruperich v. Baehr, 142 Cal. 193, 75 Pac. 782. This rule has been modified in this state in the case of executions by the provisions of section 710, Code of Civil Procedure, which prescribes that, in order to seize funds due a creditor of a municipal or public corporation, it is necessary to file a duly authenticated transcript of a judgment for money with the auditor of said city. There is no Code provision changing the general rule of public policy in cases of garnishment. Garnishment is a statutory remedy, and the rule of public policy is that it shall not be applied to funds due from a municipality.

[3] Appellant argues that, as the money was due in a street proceeding, it was not primarily due from the city, but was held by the city as money in trust for the defendants, and that the general rule with reference to garnishments applies under such circumstances. We see no reason for a different rule in such a case, when we consider the reasons for the rule of public policy herein announced. The reason for that rule is well stated in the case of Skelly v. School District, supra, by the following quotation from an Illinois case:

"It must be decided as a question of public policy. These municipal corporations are in the exercise of governmental powers to a very large extent. They control pecuniary interests of great magnitude, and vast numbers of human beings who are more dependent on the municipality for the security of life and property than they are on either the state or the federal government. To permit the great public duties of this corporation to be imperfectly performed, in order that individuals may the better collect their private debts, would be to pervert the great objects of its creation. * * * We understand, however, the counsel for the appellant to concede that money due municipal officers, agents, or contractors is not liable to garnishment; but it is insisted, if the city had been required to answer, the alleged indebtedness in the present case would not have fallen in either of these classes. But, in our opinion, the city should not be subjected to this species of litigation, no matter what may be the character of its indebtedness. If we hold it must answer in all these cases, and the exemption from liability be allowed to depend in each case upon the character of the indebtedness, we still leave it liable to a vast amount of litigation in which it has no interest, and obliged to spend the money of the people and the time of its officials in the management of matters wholly foreign to the object of its creation."

It would seem that these objections to applying to a municipality the general provisions of the garnishment statutes are equally potent, whether the city is the primary debtor or whether it holds the fund as agent for the property owners. But, however that may be, we are not called upon to decide that question in the present case, because, so far as the record shows, the money garnished constituted a direct obligation of the city to the respondent. The record does not disclose under what authority or circumstances the city of Los Angeles became indebted to respondent, or the character of that indebtedness. The case, therefore, falls within the general rule announced in the cases hereinbefore cited

[4] Appellants further contend that the municipality waived any objection to the garnishment by failing to object thereto, and that the creditor cannot urge this exemption. The rule of law herein applied, being founded upon considerations of public policy, for the protection of the best interests of the persons dependent upon the municipality for the security of life and property, we think it cannot be waived by the officers and agents of the municipality. This was expressly decided in the case of Porter v. Perdue, 105 Ala. 293, 16 South. 713, 53 Am. St. Rep. 124, in which it was said:

"Garnishment is a remedy or process of purely statutory creation and existence. There is no authority for a resort to it—courts are without jurisdiction to grant and effectuate it—except in cases and against parties which and who are within the terms of the statute. Public corporations, such as towns and cities, are not within the purview of the statute of garnishment in this state. They are held not to be subject to this process, unless included in unequivocal terms by the letter of the statute, on grounds of public policy, and our statute does not so include them. * * * But whether the nonliability of such corporations to this process be put upon the idea of exemption merely from the operation of a statute broad enough to embrace them, or upon the idea that they are not embraced at all in the terms of the statute, is of no practical consequence. If they are not within the statute at all, no court has, nor by consent can acquire, jurisdiction to proceed against them in this way; and if it is a mere matter of exemption, the same public policy which gives life to it is potent also to prevent the officers and agents for the time being of such corporations from waiving the exemption by appearing, without objection, and admitting indebtedness for the corporation."

The order appealed from is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. LONGLAND. (Cr. 758.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 4, 1921.)

1. Criminal law ⟸742(1)—Credibility of detective's testimony for the jury.

The credibility of the testimony of a detective in corroboration of a confessed accomplice is for the jury.

2. Witnesses ⟸340(3)—Testimony as to defendant's immoral conduct, without connection being shown with crime charged, held error.

In prosecution of a woman for arson, testimony as to frequent acts of intimacy between defendant and a confessed accomplice during a period of time commencing a long time prior to the commission of the act, without a showing of any connection between defendant's immoral acts and the commission of the crime of arson, held ground for reversal.

3. Criminal law ⚖811(5)—Instruction charging jury not to disregard testimony of detective objectionable.

Instruction, charging jurors not to disregard the testimony of detectives merely because they had been employed as such, held objectionable, in that it directed the special attention of the jury to the testimony of one particular witness.

4. Criminal law ⚖762(1) — Cautionary instruction against testimony of particular witness improper.

It is error for the judge in his instructions to single out a particular witness and to direct cautionary instructions against his testimony, since such an instruction tends to convey to the jury the impression that the particular witness is disbelieved by the judge.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; J. A. Allen, Judge.

Florence M. Longland was convicted of arson, and she appeals. Reversed.

Power & McFadzean and Bradley & Bradley, all of Visalia, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Arthur Keetch, and John W. Maltman, Deputy Attys. Gen., for the People.

SHAW, J. Defendant appeals from the judgment pronounced following her conviction of the crime of arson.

The subject of the arson was a dwelling house situated upon a ranch located in Tulare county, owned by defendant, and which was destroyed by fire on February 26, 1919, while defendant was absent therefrom in the state of Nevada.

[1] The evidence upon which she was convicted is that of a confessed accomplice, Henry Ingram, and James Duffy, a detective, whose corroborative testimony, notwithstanding its questionable character, the jury within its province accepted as true.

According to Ingram's testimony, his acquaintance with defendant began in 1908. Later, in 1918, a relation of intimate friendship ripened into an engagement of marriage, which existed at the time when he says that, acting at defendant's request and pursuant to an agreement made with her so to do, he, while she was in Nevada, set the fire whereby the dwelling house was destroyed; that her purpose, as repeatedly stated to him, in wishing the house burned, was to render it impossible for Mr. Willard, with whom she was involved in litigation as to the right to possession of the property, and who, with his mother, resided upon the premises against defendant's will, to continue his occupation of the same. The testimony of Duffy is that, pursuant to his employment as an investigator, he had a conversation with defendant, who, prior to such time, was an entire stranger to him, wherein she of her own accord stated that Ingram in committing the arson had acted at her request and under her direction, all of which evidence tending to implicate defendant in the commission of the crime which she strenuously denied.

[2] While no attack is made upon the sufficiency of the evidence to warrant the verdict, counsel for appellant directs attention to facts showing its inherent weakness, the purpose thereof being to illustrate the prejudicial effect of the ruling of the court in erroneously admitting a line of testimony given by Ingram to the effect that, commencing at a time long prior to the commission of the crime, and on a great number of occasions, he and defendant had indulged in acts of illicit intercourse. No purpose could be served by quoting the testimony touching these acts. Suffice it to say, that, over defendant's objection, Ingram was not only permitted to relate the minute and disgusting details of such acts, but also to repeat the shockingly vile and offensive language the use of which he attributed to defendant on some of such occasions. If true, the nature of his testimony was such as to establish the fact that defendant had reached a point in moral degredation comparable only with those of the most abandoned of her sex. While the Attorney General concedes that perhaps the indecent and disgusting character of the testimony adduced from the witness touching the acts and conduct of defendant was such as to unnecessarily accentuate them, nevertheless he insists the evidence was admissible for the purpose of proving the motive and intent of defendant, which acts, it is claimed, "furnish a clear and understandable motive for the commission of the crime." Counsel, however, fails to direct our attention to any evidence which tends in the slightest degree to support his assertion, or show any causal connection between defendant's immoral acts and the commission of the crime with which she was charged. In the absence of such showing, we are unable to perceive how or why the commission of such acts of illicit intercourse should have prompted defendant to commit the criminal offense with which she was charged, the motive for which act, according to the testimony of both Ingram and Duffy, was the fact that she desired to have Willard and his mother, who occupied the house, leave the ranch, and as a means of compelling them to do so she induced Ingram to destroy the house, thus rendering the premises uninhabitable; a further motive for which might be the fact, which is made to appear, that she held a policy of insurance upon the house. Since the testimony as to defendant's immoral conduct did not tend to establish a motive for committing the crime, its sole and only effect was to show that she was a most dissolute and degraded character, and thus excite in the minds of the jurors a prejudice against her on account of matters which, if true, were in no wise connected with the crime for which she was being tried, and cause them to give less weight to her testimony than they otherwise would have done.

"The general rule is that the prosecution is not only forbidden to prove any other crime, but may not introduce evidence designed merely to degrade and prejudice the defendant before the jury." People v. Glass, 158 Cal. 655, 112 Pac. 281; People v. Smith, 9 Cal. App. 644, 99 Pac. 1111; People v. Wallace, 89 Cal. 158, 26 Pac. 650.

[3, 4] While the judgment must be reversed on account of the admission of the testimony referred to, we deem it worth while to consider appellant's attack upon the ruling of the court in instructing the jury, at the request of the prosecution, as follows:

"You are further instructed that you should not as jurors disregard the testimony of hired detectives solely and only for the reason that they have been thus employed. You should give to their testimony the same consideration as to any other testimony in the case, giving it such weight as, considering the nature of the same, the opportunities for knowing the facts to which they testify, and their appearance and demeanor upon the witness stand, and all the other elements which go to their credibility, including their interest and bias, and to give their testimony such weight as, under all the circumstances, the same is in your judgment entitled to receive."

As an abstract proposition of law, the instruction may not be erroneous. Nevertheless it is subject to the objection that, inasmuch as Duffy was the only detective who had testified, the effect thereof was to single him out for special attention. That the jury so understood it is apparent from the fact that after spending several hours in deliberating upon their verdict they returned into court, when one of their number said:

"Your Honor, we would like to hear your instructions * * * in regard to Mr. Duffy. I believe you had some instruction in regard to his testimony" —to which the court replied:

"I had no instruction in regard to Mr. Duffy, but as to the detective.

"Juror: Well, as to the detective."

Whereupon the jurors returned to their deliberations, and shortly brought in the verdict.

"It is error for the judge in his instruction to the jury, to single out a particular witness and to direct such cautionary instructions against his testimony, as such a course would tend to convey to the jury the impression that that particular witness is disbelieved by the judge." Jones on Evidence, § 905; People v. Lonnen, 139 Cal. 634, 73 Pac. 586; People v. Blunkall, 31 Cal. App. 778, 161 Pac. 997; People v. Kilfoil, 27 Cal. App. 36, 148 Pac. 812.

While the instructions considered in the cases cited were cautionary in character, what is said is likewise applicable to laudatory instructions. In the one case the instruction is objectionable because it might indicate that the particular witness is disbelieved by the judge; in the other it is objectionable because of the added weight which the jury might attach to the testimony on account of what is said by the court. No occasion existed for so instructing the jury. The giving of it was error for the reason that it directed the jury's special attention to the testimony of one particular witness, by reason of which fact it might have attached greater weight to Duffy's testimony than it would have done under the general instructions given as applicable to the credibility of all the witnesses testifying in the case.

The judgment is reversed.

Ex parte DAYTON. (Cr. 797.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 13, 1921.)

Health ⊂⊃24—Health authorities of city may quarantine one reasonably deemed certain to have an infectious disease.

A woman who was an inmate of a brothel and was reasonably suspected of having an infectious venereal disease may be quarantined by the health authorities of a city and pursuant thereto kept in custody by the chief of police.

In the matter of the application of Betty Dayton for a writ of habeas corpus, to be directed to the chief of police of the city of Los Angeles to secure a release of petitioner from quarantine. Writ denied.

Cooper, Collings & Shreve, of Los Angeles, for petitioner.

Erwin W. Widney, City Prosecutor, and Harry A. Mock, Deputy City Prosecutor, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

PER CURIAM. By the petition herein it is shown that the chief of police of the city of Los Angeles, acting under instructions from the health department of said city, is depriving petitioner of her liberty and detaining her at the city jail; that such detention is being enforced by reason of a purported order of quarantine issued by the said health department, which order is based upon the alleged ground that the health authorities have reasonable and probable cause to believe that petitioner is affected with a contagious or infectious venereal disease. Petitioner alleges further that said health department has demanded that petitioner submit herself for examination to determine the presence of such disease, and that she has refused to obey that order. Respondent justifies the detention of petitioner upon the ground that she is a lewd and dissolute person, and, in fact, a prostitute.

In a recent case this court has had occasion to consider a similar situation affecting the right of quarantine officers and has marked out a measure of that right. In re Arata, 198 Pac. 814. In that case it was held that the health department was authorized to enforce quarantine measures against persons where there was reasonable ground to believe that such persons were affected with the kind of disease referred to, and it was held that, in the case of a woman of ill fame, that fact in itself afforded sufficient ground for the inference that she might be affected with the disease. Evidence consisting of oral testimony of the witnesses and an affidavit were presented at the hearing, and from that evidence we have reached the conclusion that the house at which the petitioner was residing at the time of her arrest was a house of ill fame, and that she was one of the inmates thereof. All the circumstances shown in the evidence tend to support that conclusion. It is not essential that the particular acts indulged in in such houses be expressly shown. All of the surroundings, as the evidence illustrated them, the actions, conduct, and demeanor of the persons occupying the place, in the aggregate established to our minds quite clearly and beyond a probability merely that the house was a house of ill fame, and that the inmates belonged to the class mentioned.

Petitioner is remanded to the custody of respondent.

Appeal and error ⊂⊃616(2)—Statement on motion for new trial is insufficient unless settled by the judge.

A statement on motion for new trial, like a bill of exceptions, is incomplete and ineffective until it has been allowed and settled by the judge (Code Civ. Proc. § 653), and the presence of counsel's certificate at the close of the transcript is merely for the authentication of the papers as they appear on file, and does not supply the lack of authentication by the judge.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; S. M. Marsh, Judge.

Action by L. A. Lesure against George H. Hutton, Administrator of the Estate of Merrill B. Crabtree, deceased, and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and the defendants appeal. Affirmed.

W. J. Mossholder, of San Diego, for appellants.

A. T. Roark, of San Diego, for respondent.

WORKS, J. The defendants appeal from a judgment for plaintiff. Appellants complain of certain alleged errors of law occurring at the trial, but respondent contends that there is before us no properly authenticated record upon which we may base a consideration of the questions appellants seek to present. The appeal was taken under the original as distinguished from what is known as the alternative method of appeal.

The printed transcript on appeal contains a number of pages of matter under the heading, "Statement on Motion for a New Trial," but there is nothing in the record to show that the statement was ever settled by the trial judge. There is at the end of the transcript the usual certificate of counsel, taking the place of a certificate of the clerk, to the effect that "the foregoing transcript is correct and contains a true copy" of certain named documents, including the statement mentioned above, "all as the same are on file or of record in the office" of the clerk of the trial court, in the action.

A statement on motion for a new trial, like a bill of exceptions, is incomplete and ineffective until it has been allowed and settled by the judge. Code Civ. Proc. § 653; People v. Crane, 60 Cal. 279; Witter v. Andrews, 122 Cal. 1, 54 Pac. 276; Sauer v. Eagle Brewing Co., 3 Cal. App. 127, 84 Pac. 425. A bill of exceptions, so called, is not a bill of exceptions before settlement, nor is a document styled a statement on motion for a new trial really such a statement before settlement. The character of such documents is truly reflected in the parlance of the practice, for before settlement they are called respectively proposed bills of exceptions and proposed statements, and until settlement they are but the ex parte recitals of the parties proposing them. Appellants are not helped out of their plight by the presence of the certificate of counsel at the close of the transcript, for that certificate, being merely for the authentication of the papers as they appear on file, in no sense supplies the lack of an authentication by the judge, by way of settlement of a bill of exceptions or statement, of ocurrences at the trial. Fitzpatrick v. Fitch, 83 Cal. 490, 23 Pac. 531; Muzzy v. D. H. McEwen Lumber Co., 154 Cal. 685, 98 Pac. 1062; Knox v. Schrag, 18 Cal. App. 220, 122 Pac. 969.

WILEY v. COLE et al. (Civ. 3504.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 12, 1921.)

1. Highways ⟸184(1)—In action for damages in automobile collision, complaint held to state cause of action, and not uncertain.

A complaint, alleging that on a specified date defendants drove and operated their automobile in a southerly direction, on a specified highway approximately 1½ miles south of B., in such a careless, negligent, reckless, wrongful, and unlawful manner that it collided with plaintiff's automobile, then being driven in a northerly direction on such highway, thereby damaging plaintiff's automobile in the sum of $397.19, being the usual and reasonable charge for making repairs made necessary by the collision, stated a cause of action, and was not uncertain.

2. Negligence ⟸111(1)—Complaint, alleging acts were negligent, sufficient.

In an action for negligence it is sufficient to allege what was done by defendant, and that it was negligently done, without stating the particular omission which rendered the act negligent.

3. Highways ⟸184(1)—Complaint held to show negligent driving was proximate cause of damage in collision.

In an action for damages sustained in an automobile collision, a complaint, alleging that defendants drove their automobile in such a careless and negligent manner that it collided with plaintiff's automobile, sufficiently alleged that defendants' negligence was the proximate cause of the injury.

4. Pleading ⟸35—Allegations that driving of automobile was careless, reckless, wrongful, and unlawful held properly disregarded as surplusage.

In an action for damages sustained in an automobile collision, where the complaint alleged that defendant was operating his automobile in a negligent, "careless, reckless, wrongful, and unlawful" manner, the quoted words were no more than other expressions of the alleged act of negligence, and might be disregarded as surplusage, and did not require plaintiff to specify what law was violated, or wherein defendant's act was wrongful.

Appeal from Superior Court, Orange County; R. Y. Williams, Judge.

Action by H. C. Wiley against J. E. Cole and others. From a judgment for defendants on demurrer, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

David R. Faries, Ivan Kelso, and John R. Berryman, Jr., all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Eden & Koepsel, of Santa Ana, for respondents.

SHAW, J. In this action plaintiff sought to recover damages alleged to have been sustained as the result of defendants' negligence in operating an automobile.

The appeal is from a judgment in favor of defendants which was entered upon plaintiff's refusal to amend his complaint after an order made by the court sustaining a demurrer interposed upon the ground that the complaint not only failed to state a cause of action but was uncertain.

[1] The allegations of the complaint material to the discussion are: That on or about the 10th day of August, 1919, the defendants above named drove and operated their certain automobile in a southerly direction on that certain public highway known as Grand avenue, approximately 1½ miles south of Buena Park, Orange county, in such a careless, negligent, reckless, wrongful, and unlawful manner that the defendants' said automobile collided with the automobile of the plaintiff, which was then and there being driven in a northerly direction on said highway, thereby damaging plaintiff's automobile in the sum of $397.19, being the usual and reasonable charge for making repairs to plaintiff's automobile made necessary by said collision. In our opinion, the complaint is not obnoxious to the demurrer upon either ground specified therein.

[2, 3] The argument of respondents is that, while the complaint charges defendants with operating their car in a negligent manner, it is insufficient to state a cause of action, because it does not state the particular acts constituting the negligence imputed to defendants in the operation of the automobile; in other words, does not set out evidentiary matter. No principle seems to be better settled in this state than that—

> "Negligence may be charged in general terms; that is, what was done being stated, it is sufficient to say it was negligently done, without stating the particular omission which rendered the act negligent." Smith v. Buttner, 90 Cal. 99, 27 Pac. 29; Stein v. United Railroads, 159 Cal. 368, 113 Pac. 663; Bergen v. Tulare County Power Co., 173 Cal. 709, 161 Pac. 269.

Neither is the complaint defective in failing to allege facts showing that defendants' negligence was the proximate cause of the injury. It clearly appears from the allegation that defendants were operating their automobile in a negligent manner, and that by reason of such negligence their automobile collided with that of plaintiff and thereby caused the injury.

[4] Respondents also argue that, since plaintiff, in addition to the use of the word "negligent," alleged that defendants' operation of the automobile was wrongful and unlawful, he should have specified particularly what law was violated and wherein their act was wrongful. No authorities are cited in support of this contention, and we are unable to perceive any merit therein. Clearly, as shown by the complaint, the action is based upon defendants' negligent act in operating their automobile, and the words "careless, reckless, wrongful, and unlawful" are nothing more than other expressions of the alleged act of negligence, and since their use neither adds to nor their omission detracts from the sufficiency of the complaint, they should, where used in this connection, be disregarded as surplusage. If defendants' act was negligent, it was likewise wrongful and unlawful, in that by such negligent act they, without right or warrant of law, caused damage to plaintiff.

The complaint, if true, shows that defendants were guilty of negligence in operating their automobile, and that as a result of such negligence they caused it to collide with that of plaintiff, which was the proximate cause of the injury complained of.

The court erred in sustaining the demurrer.

The judgment is reversed.

1. Infants ⊂⊃20—Failure to make outcry goes only to credibility of prosecutrix in prosecution for lewd acts committed on child.

In a prosecution for lewd and lascivious acts committed on a girl of 10, in violation of Pen. Code, § 288, failure to make outcry immediately after the commission of the act goes only to the question of the credibility of prosecutrix.

2. Criminal law ⊂⊃369(1)—Testimony of act of defendant with prosecuting witness and another girl inadmissible.

In a prosecution for lewd and lascivious acts committed on a girl of 10, in violation of Pen. Code, § 288, testimony as to some acts of indiscretion by defendant in relation to the prosecuting witness and another girl was inadmissible.

3. Criminal law ⊂⊃1171(2)—Statement of district attorney as to defendant's admission harmless.

In a prosecution for lewd and lascivious acts committed on a girl of 10, in violation of Pen. 4. Criminal law ⊂⊃396(2)—Testimony of officer as to accusation by girl against defendant admissible in view of defendant's limitation of his denial.

In a prosecution for lewd and lascivious acts committed on a girl of 10, in violation of Pen. Code, § 288, where defendant in his cross-examination of a police officer brought out other statements which he made at the time of the denial to the officer explaining his conduct toward both of the girls involved, he in such way so limited the effect of his denial of the accusation by the girl as to render competent testimony of the officer as to what the girl said which would otherwise have been inadmissible in the face of defendant's denial.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Lincoln S. Church, Judge.

F. J. Healey was convicted of lewd and lascivious acts committed on a girl of 10 years, in violation of Penal Code, § 288, and he appeals. Judgment affirmed.

E. E. Gehring and Allen C. Cunha, both of Oakland, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

NOURSE, J. Defendant appeals from a judgment and order denying his motion for a new trial after conviction on an information charging him with a violation of section 288 of the Penal Code. It is alleged in the information that the offense consisted of lewd and lascivious acts committed in relation to a girl of the age of 10 years.

Appellant has assigned three grounds for reversal: (1) Insufficiency of the evidence; (2) misconduct of the district attorney; and (3) error in the admission of certain evidence.

[1] The first ground assigned is based upon the improbability of the story of the complaining witness, the appearance that she had been coached in her story, and the fact that she failed to make an outcry. But a review of the record satisfactorily shows that, though the testimony of the complaining witness may not seem to be altogether convincing, it was sufficient to sustain the verdict if believed by the jury. The weight of the evidence is, of course, a matter for the jury, and not for this court. The failure to make an outcry immediately after the commission of the act goes only to the question of credibiliy of the prosecutrix.

[2, 3] 2. Misconduct on the part of the district attorney is assigned in his reference in his opening statement to an alleged admission made by the defendant in the presence of certain police officers of some act of indiscretion in relation to the prosecuting witness and another girl. When the offer to produce such testimony was made by the district attorney, defendant's counsel objected, and the district attorney confessed error and withdrew the remark. Thereupon the court instructed the jury to disregard it.

But when the witness Lilienthal was on the stand the district attorney endeavored to get similar testimony before the jury. That the testimony was not admissible reference need be made only to the recent opinion of the Supreme Court in People v. Anthony, 196 Pac. 47. But defendant did not assign the error at the time or request the court to instruct the jury to disregard it. It is apparent from the entire record that no harm resulted from the error now criticized because the defendant in his own examination and in the cross-examination of the police officer brought before the jury the only testimony regarding the other girl which was at all incriminatory.

[4] 3. Over the objection of defendant the prosecution was permitted to introduce the testimony of a police officer regarding what was said by the prosecuting witness in defendant's presence soon after his arrest. The testimony covered statements made by the prosecuting witness which were accusatory in character. On his direct examination the officer testified that when the accusation was made the defendant merely said: "That is not the truth. The girl is mistaken." If the testimony had closed there, and if this answer should be treated as a complete and unqualified denial of the whole accusation, then the testimony of the officer relating to what was said by the prosecutrix was inadmissible. As said in People v. Teshara, 134 Cal. 542, 544, 66 Pac. 798, 799:

"It is not the accusation, but the conduct of the accused, that is evidence in such cases, and that the only reason for admitting the accusation is to explain the conduct. The district attorney should not have offered this evidence, knowing, as he did, that Teshara had not remained silent under the accusation, but had repelled it at the time it was made."

To the same effect is People v. Philbon, 138 Cal. 530, 532, 71 Pac. 650.

But the defendant, in his cross-examination of the officer, brought out other statements which he made at the time explaining his conduct toward both of the girls, and in this way so limited the effect of his denial of the accusation as to render competent the testimony which otherwise would have been inadmissible.

The judgment is affirmed.

CALIFORNIA NAT. SUPPLY CO. v. DINSMORE et al. (Civ. 3670.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. May 5, 1921.)

1. Corporations ⊂=244(5) — Purchasers of stock issued for property overvalued liable if stock taken with notice, but not otherwise.

Where stock in an oil company was issued for an oil lease worth far less than the par value of the stock and the larger part of the stock was returned to the treasury and sold, purchasers of the stock were bound to make good the difference between the value of the property transferred and the par value of the stock to creditors extending credit without notice of the overvaluation if they took the stock with notice, but were not liable unless they participated in the original transaction or received the stock with knowledge thereof.

2. Corporations ⊂=232(3) — Creditors extending credit with knowledge of issuance of stock for property at overvaluation cannot hold stockholders liable.

One extending credit to a corporation with knowledge of the issuance of its stock for a greatly overvalued oil lease cannot recover in a court of equity on a creditors' bill against the owner of the stock.

3. Corporations ⊂=271—Finding that creditor did not know of issuance of stock as fully paid not overcome by other findings.

A finding that one extending credit to an oil company did not know of the issuance and sale of stock as fully paid and had no knowledge of the transactions respecting the sale and issuance of the stock was not overcome by other findings that the seller had for many years been engaged in selling tools, appliances, and supplies to persons and corporations drilling for oil, and was generally familiar with the practices and methods of acquiring and developing oil lands.

4. Corporations ⊂=232(3) — Stockholders of mining corporations liable to creditors for difference between par value and price paid.

The rule allowing creditors to recover against the stockholders of a defunct corporation the difference between the price paid for their stock and the par value and apply it to the satisfaction of a judgment against the defunct corporation applies to mining corporations.

5. Limitation of actions ⊂=58(4) — Forfeiture of charter does not start limitations running against stockholders' liability.

The dissolution of a corporation by operation of law for failure to pay its license tax does not mature its obligations so as to start the statute of limitations running against stockholders' liability.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frederick W. Houser, Judge.

Action by the California National Supply Company against J. H. Dinsmore and another, in which Fronia May Dinsmore, administratrix, has been substituted for the defendant named. From a judgment in favor of plaintiff, defendants appeal. Reversed, with directions.

Haas & Dunnigan and J. J. Wilson, all of Los Angeles, for appellants.

Flint & Mackay, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WASTE, P. J. The plaintiff, a judgment creditor of the Rex Midway Oil Company, now defunct, for failure to pay its state license tax, brought this action against the defendants, J. H. and Fronia May Dinsmore, alleging them to be the holders of "watered stock" of the corporation. It seeks to recover from the defendants their proportionate share of the difference between the amount at which they purchased the stock, and its par value, and to have the amount applied in liquidation of its claim. Judgment was entered for the plaintiff, and the defendants appealed. The defendant J. H. Dinsmore died after the appeal was perfected, and on suggestion of his death it was ordered that the action be continued against his administratrix with the will annexed, in his place and stead.

The findings closely follow a written stipulation of facts which is brought here in the bill of exceptions. The Rex Midway Oil Company was incorporated April 21, 1910, with an authorized capital stock of $250,000, divided into 1,000,000 shares of the par value of 25 cents each. When organized it purchased from F. H. Lathrop a lease held by him of certain property in Kern county, supposed to be oil-bearing land. In payment, and by way of exchange for this lease, the company issued to Lathrop 999,980 shares of the capital stock, with an agreement on the part of Lathrop and the company that all of said stock was fully paid. Lathrop immediately returned to the company, and contributed to the treasury, 950,000 shares of such fully paid stock for the general use and benefit of the corporation, to be sold as its board of directors should deem expedient, and at such price as the board should determine. The only consideration received by the Rex Midway Oil Company for the issuance of the stock to Lathrop was the transfer by him of the leasehold interest, the actual and market value of which was never in excess of the sum of $2,000, a fact well known to each of the directors of the company. They had no reasonable ground for considering it worth any greater amount, but believed that the property might be developed and made valuable.

The corporation subsequently increased the amount of its capital stock to $1,000,000, divided into a like number of shares of the par value of $1 each. At the time of this increase the assets of the Rex Midway Oil Company were not worth more than $2,000, a fact well known to the directors. Some time later the defendants acquired their stock, the greater part of which was purchased directly from the company and was an original issue of a portion of the treasury stock returned to the corporation by Lathrop. The remaining shares were acquired by them from other parties who had purchased directly from the company, and were also a part of the retransferred treasury stock. The certificates of stock received by the defendants contained the statement that the authorized capital stock of the company was $1,000,000, having a par value of $1 per share. It does not appear, however, what price the defendants paid for the stock, or whether they took it as partially or wholly paid. After the defendants became stockholders in the corporation the plaintiff sold and delivered certain goods, wares, and merchandise to the Rex Midway Oil Company, for which it received a promissory note, dated April 23, 1913, for the sum of $3,074.03, due 60 days after date, with interest at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum from date until paid. On November 30, 1913, following the execution of the note, the Rex Midway Oil Company forfeited its charter to the state by reason of its failure to pay the license tax imposed upon it, which became due on July 1st of that year. The note not being paid, plaintiff commenced an action against the directors, as trustees of the corporation, to recover the amount due, and on May 11, 1915, a judgment was entered in its favor in the sum of $3,389.32. Execution was returned wholly unsatisfied on June 4, 1915, and no portion of the judgment has been paid except the sum of $75.18.

The present action was brought by the plaintiff against the defendants as two of the stockholders of the defunct corporation on their alleged liability on this unsatisfied judgment. After allowing defendants a credit of 24½ cents per share on the amount of their stock, by reason of the satisfaction of a judgment obtained against them and other stockholders in another action, the lower court found the defendants, and each of them, to be liable to plaintiff in the sum of 75 cents on each share of stock owned by them, not to exceed in the case of either of them the amount of the obligation here sued upon, together with interest. From the judgment entered in accordance with these findings, this appeal is prosecuted.

[1] The judgment must be reversed. The relationship, and the liability imposed upon corporation stockholders owning shares ostensibly fully paid, but not so in fact, have been so recently considered in, and we think definitely settled by, two recent decisions of the Supreme Court, handed down after the preparation and submission of this appeal, that we do not think it necessary or expedient to enter into a discussion of those interesting questions. Suffice it to say that under these decisions the stockholders who received this stock in exchange for the property and those subsequently taking the stock with notice of the original transaction were bound to make good the difference between the value of the property transferred and the par value of the stock, to creditors extending credit without notice of such overvaluation. Rhode v. Dock Hop Co. (Sup.), 194 Pac. 11; Sherman v. S. K. D. Oil Co. (Sup.) 197 Pac. 799. As we understand the rule established by those opinions, there is no real distinction between one who takes stock, not fully paid, from the original holder, and one who acquires it by direct purchase from the company after it has vested in the treasury of the corporation. In either case, before the transferee can be held liable to the creditor, it must be shown that he participated in the original transaction or received his stock with knowledge thereof. In this case it is not alleged, stipulated as a fact, nor found that the defendants were parties to the original transaction, by which the entire capital stock of the Rex Midway Oil Company was issued for the greatly overvalued oil lease, or that as transferees they had any notice of, or became parties to, that proceeding. Consequently they cannot be compelled to make good the false representation as to the capital of the company which they had no part in making, and the responsibility for which they have done nothing to assume. The two decisions last noted so hold.

[2, 3] In view of the possibility of another trial we deem it proper to consider other points arising on this appeal. It is claimed by the appellants that the plaintiff extended its credit to the Rex Midway Oil Company with knowledge of the issuance of the stock at an overvaluation. If that were so the plaintiff may not recover in a court of equity on a creditors' bill. Rhode v. Dock Hop Co., supra; Sherman v. S. K. D. Oil Co., supra; Sherman v. Harley, 178 Cal. 584, 590, 174 Pac. 901, 7 A. L. R. 950. It was found by the trial court that neither prior to the time the plaintiff first dealt with the oil company, nor at any time while credit was being extended to it by plaintiff, was plaintiff informed, nor did it have any knowledge, that the oil company had issued and sold the shares to F. H. Lathrop as fully paid, and that it had no knowledge of the transactions of the oil company with respect to the sale and issuance of its capital stock. The impelling force of this finding, which is but a repetition of the stipulated fact, is not overcome by certain other findings from which it appears that the plaintiff had for many years prior to its dealings with the oil company been engaged in the business of selling tools, appliances, and supplies to persons and corporations engaged in drilling for oil in California, particularly those operating in Kern county, and was generally familiar with the practices and methods of acquiring and developing oil lands.

[4] Although engaged exclusively in the business of prospecting for oil, the Rex Midway Oil Company was incorporated in the manner and for the general purpose of mining. Appellants contend that the rule allowing creditors to recover against the stockholders of a defunct corporation the difference between the price paid by the stockholder for his stock and the par value thereof, and apply the same to the satisfaction of a judgment held by the creditor against the defunct corporation, does not apply to mining corporations. They cite a number of cases from other jurisdictions, and rely with much assurance upon the case of In re South Mountain Con. Min. Co. (C. C.) 14 Fed. 347, to support this contention. But our own Supreme Court, in a comparatively recent decision, held that the rule enunciated in Herron v. Shaw, 165 Cal. 668, 133 Pac. 488, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 1265, and in Harrison v. Armour, 169 Cal. 787, 147 Pac. 1166, is a general rule, applicable to all classes of corporations, and that the decision in the South Mountain Mining Company Case no longer properly expresses the law in force in this state. Hasson v. Koeberle, 180 Cal. 359, 365, 181 Pac. 387.

[5] The Rex Midway Oil Company forfeited its charter on November 30, 1913. Appellants contend that the consequent dissolution of the corporation had the effect of maturing its obligations, and that recovery against them is for that reason barred by various provisions of the statute of limitations. This contention has been effectually disposed of by the very recent decision of the Supreme Court in Sherman v. S. K. D. Oil Co., supra, in which it was held that the dissolution of a corporation, by operation of law for failure to pay its license tax, does not have the effect of maturing its obligations. The original obligation of the Rex Midway Oil Company, the promissory note executed to plaintiff, was given April 23, 1913. Judgment against the trustees of the defunct corporation was entered May 11, 1915, and execution returned nulla bona June 4th of the same year. The present cause of action was, therefore, not barred by any of the provisions of the statute when the complaint was filed on December 20, 1916.

The judgment is reversed, and the lower court is directed to grant permission to the parties to amend their pleadings if so advised.

BOARD OF EDUCATION OF CITY OF SANTA ANA v. TALBERT, Chairman of Board of Sup'rs. (Civ. 3634.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 19, 1921.)

1. Statutes ⊜225 — Where statutes dealing with the same subject are not repugnant, both should be given effect.

Where two statutes dealing with the same subject are not repugnant in their provisions, both should be given effect.

2. Schools and school districts ⊜97(1)—Act held to provide an alternative method for issuing bonds, so that district was not required to follow it.

Act March 20, 1909 (St. 1909, p. 528), applicable to issuance of bonds by districts in cities of the fifth class, etc., while providing for bonds bearing a higher rate of interest than prescribed by Pol. Code, § 1880 et seq., and varying therefrom in other respects, held to merely provide an alternative method of issuing bonds; hence an issue in accordance with the Code provisions is valid, and the chairman of the board of supervisors of the county may, by mandamus, be required to sign the bonds.

Petition by the Board of Education of the City of Santa Ana for a writ of mandate to be directed to T. D. Talbert, as Chairman of the Board of Supervisors of the County of Orange, to require the signing of certain bonds. Writ granted.

L. A. West, of Santa Ana, for petitioner.
O'Melveny, Millikin & Tuller, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

JAMES, J. In this proceeding petitioner asks for a writ of mandate to compel respondent chairman of the board of supervisors of Orange county to sign certain bonds in the amount of $75,000. On the 9th day of February, 1921, petitioner, as the governing board of the Santa Ana school district (the city of Santa Ana being a city of the fifth class), adopted a resolution calling an election for the purpose of having submitted to the electors of said district the question as to whether bonds in the amount mentioned should be issued. Due notice was given of said election, the election was held, a favorable vote was obtained on the proposition to issue the bonds, and return made to the board of supervisors of the various steps taken and proceedings had. All of such proceedings were had and taken in strict compliance with the provisions of section 1880 et seq., Political Code. The petition fully set out the facts and the exhibits attached thereto substantiated the statements made in the petition. Respondent, in answer to the prayer for the writ, makes return admitting the facts and raising the issue of law that petitioner, upon the case made by the petition, is not entitled to the writ.

It is admitted that by the sections of the Political Code a complete scheme is provided under which bonds of school districts may be issued, but respondent contends that the act of the Legislature approved March 20, 1909 (Statutes of 1909, p. 528), which act is entitled "An act to regulate the issue of bonds of school districts in cities of the fifth class, and school districts partly within and partly without such cities of the fifth class," is controlling, and that in so far as such districts are concerned the general law, as embodied in the Political Code sections, can have no application. In the first place, it is contended that the act of 1909 is exclusive because the scheme therein outlined is inconsistent in material respects with the general plan provided for in the Political Code. It is true that there are some differences between the statutes. The general requirements as to the calling of the election, the giving of notice, and the holding of the election are the same. While the Political Code sections fix the maximum rate of interest which bonds are entitled to bear at 6 per cent., the act of 1909 provides that they may bear as much as 8 per cent. Section 1885 of the Political Code declares that if the notice calling the election shall have provided that the bonds and interest be payable in gold coin of the United States, the bonds when issued shall be made so payable, but if no such expression shall be used in the notice, the bonds may be payable in "gold coin" or "lawful money," as the board of supervisors shall order. In the act of 1909 it is provided that the bonds shall be payable "in gold coin." The purposes for which bonds may be issued by a school district, as the same are specified in section 1880 of the Political Code, are precisely the same as those enumerated in the act of 1909, except that in the latter act the words "for insuring school buildings" are omitted. Petitioner insists that the plan adopted by the Santa Ana school district under the Code sections is fully authorized for two reasons: First, because the provisions of the act of 1909 are not repugnant to provisions of the Political Code, hence the latter act provides not an exclusive scheme but an alternative one; second, that, if such repugnancy exists, then the act of 1909 should be held to be unconstitutional because it is special legislation. If the conditions imposed by the act of 1909 were more restrictive than those expressed in the provisions of the Political Code, it might well be concluded that it was the intention to make the former, in its application to school districts in cities of the fifth class, exclusive. As has already been suggested, no such restrictive features are shown in the act of 1909, except that the alternative to make the bonds payable in "lawful money" instead of "gold coin" is not allowed, and the item that among the authorized purposes the act of 1909 omits to mention "for insuring school buildings." In its general import the act of 1909 seems to have been intended to extend the privileges of the school districts included within the class mentioned rather than to restrict the power given in any substantial sense. This is particularly evidenced by the provision permitting bonds to be authorized carrying an 8 per cent. interest charge, where, under the Political Code, a maximum of 6 per cent. is all that is allowed.

[1] It is a uniform rule of statutory construction that, where two statutes dealing with the same subject are not repugnant in their provisions, both shall be given effect. In harmony with this rule is the case of the City of Oakland v. Thompson, 151 Cal. 572, 91 Pac. 387. In that case there were considered two acts of the Legslature; one, general in its terms, designed to enable cities and counties and towns "to acquire, maintain, and improve public parks and boulevards"; the second and later one being "an act authorizing the incurring of indebtedness by cities, towns, and municipal corporations for municipal improvements, and regulating the acquisition, construction, and completion thereof." The city of Oakland proposed to issue bonds to purchase lands for park and boulevard purposes and proceeded under the act of 1901 (St. 1901, p. 27). It was argued in the case that the act of 1889 (St. 1889, p. 361), referring particularly to the improvement of public parks and boulevards, was exclusive in its application, and that the bonds could not be legally issued under the second act. The court said:

"Thus, if it shall be determined that the act of 1901 is in its scope broad enough to include the acquisition of lands for park and boulevard purposes, there is no constitutional inhibition forbidding the Legislature from providing two independent schemes, to either of which a municipality may have resort as it shall deem expedient. Indeed, the essential difference between the act of 1889 and that of 1901 is in the life of the bonds, the act of 1889 providing for 20-year bonds, and that of 1901 for 40-year bonds. One city might consider it to be more to its advantage to use the longer-term bonds, while another might be of contrary opinion, and, as we have said, there is no constitutional or other objection which prevents the Legislature from giving cities their option and choice in this matter."

[2] So, here, under the several statutes considered, we have two plans, in general essentials alike, but one having the effect of extending the power granted by the first; both in their nature being applicable to school districts which include cities of the fifth class. We do not regard the failure in the act of 1909 to provide for "the insuring of buildings" and the failure to provide that the bonds might, as an alternative matter, be made payable "in lawful money," to be so material as to make it evident that the Legislature designed to impose special restrictions on the bond-issuing privilege of the school districts referred to. We have given no particular attention to the suggestion that the fund out of which the interest and installments on the principal of the bonds is to be paid is given a different name by the act of 1909 from that assigned to it by the Political Code sections. In either case the fund is made up of money derived under tax levied particularly for the purpose of paying the bond debt, and it can only be used in discharge of that indebtedness. With these conclusions in mind, it is not necessary to give consideration to the argument of respective counsel upon the question as to whether the act of 1909 is unconstitutional as being special legislation. The school district in this case did not attempt to proceed under that act, and all of the steps taken, as the petition shows them to have been, answer strictly to the requirements of sections of the Political Code, which apply generally to all the school districts in the state.

In the discussion of the question here involved we have not overlooked the case of Santa Ana School District v. Talbert, 19 Cal. App. 104, 124 Pac. 872. That was a case wherein was concerned the question of the regularity of school bonds proposed to be issued under the statute of 1909, and appellant calls attention to expressions used in the decison as indicating the view of the court that the act of 1909 furnished an exclusive plan and scheme for the issuance of school district bonds in districts comprising cities of the fifth class. The language made use of and to which attention is directed was as follows:

"This act, being a complete revision of the subject to which earlier statutes related, is manifestly intended as a substitute for the former legislation, and such prior acts in relation to the subject must be considered as repealed."

The expression is dictum, because there was not in that case involved the question as to whether the act of 1909 was exclusive in furnishing the mode and method for the issuance of school bonds. The procedure was there had under the act of 1909, and the only question with which the court was concerned was as to the applicability of that act in the situation presented. The case cited following the expression above quoted, to wit, Mack v. Jastro, 126 Cal. 130, 58 Pac. 372, furnishes no aid in the solution of the question which we have here considered. That case involved a consideration and comparison of two county government acts, each covering the same subject, and the question was as to whether the later act repealed the former. The court there merely reannounced the elementary rule that, as between two acts of the Legislature, each completely covering the same subject, the one later in date would be deemed to have repealed the first.

Peremptory writ is ordered to be issued, as prayed for in the petition.

GUIDERA v. LAPIANA. (Civ. 2301.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 3, 1921, as Modified May 27, 1921.)

1. Death ⊜49(1)—Administrator's complaint held not demurrable for uncertainty as to parties.

In action for wrongful death under Code Civ. Proc. § 377, demurrer to the complaint for uncertainty in that it did not show whether plaintiff was suing as one of the heirs or as administrator, or whether the parties named as heirs were all the heirs, was properly overruled where the complaint indicated that suit was brought by plaintiff, as administrator, in behalf of the heirs, and named "the heirs" of deceased, of whom it might be assumed that he was one, as a person of his name was mentioned as one of the heirs; naming "the heirs" being equivalent to an allegation that the persons named were "all the heirs."

2. Death ⊜49(1)—Complaint must show existence of heirs.

Since an action based upon Code Civ. Proc. § 377, was intended by the Legislature to inure exclusively to the benefit of the heirs of a person whose death has been wrongfully caused, in the pleading of such an action by deceased's administrator or executor it is necessary to show that there are heirs.

3. Death ⊜49(1)—Complaint need not state heirs named are all the heirs.

While it is well directly to state in the complaint in an action for wrongful death by the representative of deceased that the heirs named therein are all the heirs of the deceased, a complaint is sufficient in that particular where it at least discloses the fact that there are heirs of the deceased, naming them, without specifically stating whether those so named constitute all the heirs.

4. Pleading ⊜406(9)—Defect in complaint for wrongful death held cured by evidence.

Assuming that complaint for wrongful death was defective in failing to state that the persons named as heirs were all the heirs of deceased, such defect was cured by the unobjected to testimony of plaintiff administrator that deceased's heirs at the time of his death consisted of his mother, brother, and himself, who were the persons named in the complaint as heirs.

5. Evidence ⊜471(24)—Wife's testimony that she saw defendant "shoot and kill" her husband not conclusion.

Testimony of deceased's wife, in action for wrongful death, that she saw defendant "shoot and kill" her husband, was not objectionable as a conclusion, especially where followed by testimony showing in what manner defendant shot or killed her husband, such as evidence that deceased died of gunshot wounds, that defendant was present at the time, and immediately thereafter fled.

6. Death ⊜75—Evidence of shooting held sufficient.

In action for wrongful death, evidence that defendant shot deceased held sufficient to support judgment for plaintiff, notwithstanding the presumption of innocence of wrongdoing.

7. Evidence ⊜60—Presumption of innocence prevails in civil as well as criminal cases.

The presumption of innocence prevails, not only in criminal cases, but also in a civil case, where a party is charged with crime.

8. Appeal and error ⊜909(1)—Presumption of innocence inapplicable on appeal.

The presumption of innocence is applicable rather in the trial below than on appeal, for, on appeal, where there is evidence to support the verdict or findings, the question whether the presumption of innocence has been overcome by the requisite degree of proof is foreclosed by the decision below or the verdict, it being presumed in such case that the court below was guided by all the tests whereby the weight and evidentiary force of testimony must be determined.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Action by Joseph Guidera, as administrator of the estate of Victor Guidera, also known as V. Guidera, deceased, against Rosario Lapiana, also known as Sam Lapiana. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

S. Luke Howe and J. J. Bauer, both of Sacramento, for appellant.

Dunn & Brand and Seymour & Downey, all of Sacramento, for respondent.

HART, J. This action is by the administrator of the estate of the above-named deceased against the defendant, for damages in the sum of $50,000 for causing wrongfully the death of said deceased. Code Civ. Proc. § 377. The case was tried by the court, without a jury, and findings and judgment were in favor of the plaintff in the sum of $15,000. The appeal is by the defendant from said judgment.

The points urged against the legal integrity of the judgment are: (1) That there was error in the order overruling the demurrer to the complaint on the ground of uncertainty, in that it cannot be ascertained from said pleading whether the plaintiff is suing as one of the heirs of deceased or as the administrator of his estate, and further that it cannot be determined therefrom whether the parties named therein as heirs at law of deceased are all the heirs of said deceased;

(2) that the overruling of the objection to certain testimony given by a witness for the plaintiff was error, and prejudicial to the rights of the defendant; (3) that the evidence is insufficient to support the findings and the judgment.

[2] The objection that the complaint does not specifically state that the parties named therein as heirs of the deceased are all the heirs of the deceased is devoid of substantial merit. It is true that an action based upon section 377 of the Code of Civil Procedure was intended by the Legislature to inure exclusively to the benefit of the heirs of a person whose death has been caused by the wrongful or negligent act of another, and, consequently, in the pleading of such an action by the administrator or executor of the estate or will of the deceased, it is necessary to show that there are heirs of the deceased; otherwise such personal representative, who in such a case is only the statutory trustee to recover damages for the benefit of the heirs, has no right of action. Webster v. Norwegian Mining Co., 137 Cal. 399, 400, 70 Pac. 276, 92 Am. St. Rep. 181; Jones v. Leonardt, 10 Cal. App. 284, 286, 101 Pac. 811; Munro v. Dredging, etc., Co., 84 Cal. 515, 24 Pac. 303, 18 Am. St. Rep. 248; Ruiz v. Santa Barbara Gas, etc., Co., 164 Cal. 188, 192, 128 Pac. 330; Hirsch v. James S. Remick Co., 38 Cal. App. 764, 177 Pac. 876.

[3] While we think it would be well enough directly to state in the complaint in such an action by the representative of deceased that the heirs named therein are all the heirs of the deceased, still we think a complaint is sufficient in that particular where, as here, it at least discloses the fact that there are heirs of the deceased, naming them, without specifically stating whether those so named constitute all the heirs. But, if it were necessary in such a case as this that all the heirs of the deceased should be named or shown by the complaint, it is clear that, grammatically construed, the averment in the complaint here as to the heirs shows that those named therein are all the heirs of deceased, since the averment is introduced by the definite article "the," thus: "The heirs of the said Victor Guidera are," naming them, thus limiting the number of the heirs of deceased to the number named in the averment, and necessarily implying that all his heirs are so named. Obviously, the averment is radically different in meaning (viewing it from a grammatical standpoint) from what it would be if it were to read: "Annie Guidera, Frank Guidera, and Joseph Guidera are heirs of the deceased."

[4] There is, however, another reason against the reversal of the judgment because of the action of the court in overruling the demurrer, assuming that the complaint is defective in the respect in which we are now considering it, and that is that the asserted defect was cured by the evidence. The plaintiff, as a witness, was asked who the surviving heirs of the deceased were at the time of his death, to which question he replied: "Why, my mother, my brother Frank, and myself." From this testimony, to which no objection was interposed, as legitimately none could be, it is clear that, since he named those only who are mentioned in the complaint as such heirs, there are or were at the time referred to no other heirs than those named in said pleading.

2. The two remaining assignments relate to the evidentiary competency and effect of the testimony given by the widow of deceased of the circumstances leading to the death of her husband, and may be considered together.

It appears that the deceased, at about 7 o'clock of the evening of September 22, 1917, was called from his home in the city of Sacramento, by some one, and that on stepping out of his house and to the sidewalk fronting the same, he was shot and killed. That the death of Guidera was produced by a gun-shot wound is conclusively shown by the autopsy record of the coroner of Sacramento county, admitted in evidence on the express stipulation of the attorneys of the respective parties, and which record contains the result of the autoptical examination of the body of the deceased by Dr. C. B. Jones, physician, and surgeon to the coroner. This record discloses that two shots were fired into the body of deceased viz.: One through the lower jaw, and one below the right angle of the mouth—

"direction slightly downward and backward. Bullet removed from between 4 and 5 cervical vertebræ; cause of death, bullet wound through neck and vetebræ, injuring spinal cord and carotid artery."

The only witness to the shooting causing the death of deceased who testified in this case was the widow of deceased. Being unable to speak English or our language so that she could be plainly understood, she gave her testimony through an interpreter, who, it seems, was also deficient to some extent in ability to speak the English language, although sufficiently familiar with the use of that language to enable him to translate the witness' testimony so that it could be understood.

Mrs. Guidera, in substance, testified (and we are taking this statement from both her direct and cross examination) that, early in the evening of September 21, 1917 (stated in the complaint as the 22d day of September, 1917), some voice called out from the outside for her husband; that, hearing the call, the deceased immediately started to go outside, and that she followed him and saw the defendant outside, near the door. She stated that she was acquainted with the defendant. She proceeded to testify on direct:

"I hear shooting; I only saw him (her husband) lay down on the floor; I only hear shooting, then I went out, find my husband lying down on the floor."

"The Court: Did you see this Lapiana (referring to defendant) shoot the gun—what kind of an instrument did he have, a pistol, rifle, or a shotgun? A. I saw him, but I did not see what he had in his hand.

"Q. Was it some kind of a gun? A. I don't know; I didn't see it.

"Q. Did you see him shoot anything? A. I just saw him shooting, and my husband drop on the floor.

"Q. Did you see Rosaria Lapiana shoot your husband? A. I see it.

"Q. What did you see? A. I saw him shooting, go away.

"Q. What happened to your husband after the shooting? A. He died."

On cross-examination, the witness stated that both she and her husband were in the kitchen of their house when they heard a voice outside calling for the deceased; that her husband started out, opening the front door, and stepping outside, and leaving the door open, and that she immediately followed him outside.

"Q. When was the first time you saw Mr. Lapiana? A. Just at the time he killed my husband."

Continuing (on cross-examination), she said that Lapiana was on the sidewalk on the outside of their yard; that her husband passed through the gate to the outside, and she remained within the yard, near the gate; that defendant was standing near a tree, only a few feet from the gate, and that her husband went to where defendant was standing; that almost immediately she heard three pistol shots, likewise followed by the falling of her husband to the ground; that thereupon the defendant, with two other men, one of them a brother of defendant, whom she did not observe until the shots were fired, ran away.

In addition to the testimony thus referred to, it was shown by circumstances that the defendant fled from the city, or, at any rate, had not, down to the date of the trial of this action, been apprehended or captured. The service of the summons in this action was, so it appears from the record, by publication.

[5] The witness, Mrs. Guidera, it will be observed, testified that she saw the defendant shoot and kill her husband. The defendant, by his counsel, moved to strike out the testimony on the ground that it involved the conclusion of the witness. The court denied the motion, and it is here claimed, as above intimated, that the action of the court on said motion was erroneous, and that the testimony to which the motion was addressed operated prejudicially against the vital rights of the defendant in the trial and decision of the case. We think the motion was properly denied. If, in the prosecution of either a civil case for damages or a criminal case directly growing out of a battery committed by the defendant, a witness should testify that he saw the defendant strike the complainant and knock him to the ground, we do not think it would be for an instant claimed that such testimony would involve the mere conclusion of the witness so testifying, or anything less than the statement of a probative fact.

We can perceive no distinction, in character or quality, between the statement of the witness in this case that she saw the defendant "shoot and kill" her husband and the statement of the witness in the supposititious case that he saw the defendant "strike and knock down" the complainant. But it is conceded by counsel for the defendant that the statement complained of may constitute the statement of a fact "if followed by testimony showing in what manner defendant shot her husband or killed her husband." While the witness was unable to state what character of weapon was used in the slaying of her husband, she did testify, as we have seen, that she heard shots, and that her husband fell to the ground immediately following such shots.

The autopsy physician, as shown, testified that he found two wounds in the body of the deceased, and that the latter's death was caused by those wounds, or one of them. These circumstances clearly showed that the plaintiff's intestate was killed by gunshot wounds inflicted upon his body, and the fact that defendant was present when the shots were fired into the body of the deceased, the further fact that he was the only person seen near the deceased when the shots were fired, and the additional fact that he immediately fled after the shots were fired and the deceased fell to the ground, are circumstances from which the trial court could reasonably and justly infer and conclude that the defendant was the slayer of the deceased. Thus it is manifest that the statement of the witness that she saw the defendant "shoot and kill her husband" was followed by testimony "showing in what manner defendant shot and killed her husband"—that is, that the slaying was committed by the defendant by means of a loaded firearm, the particular nature of which the witness was not able to say.

[6, 7] The above consideration of the evidence, although for the purpose of reviewing the order of the court denying defendant's motion to strike out the testimony adverted to, constitutes a sufficient answer to the point that the findings and the judgment find no evidential support in the record. But there is another circumstance to which, in the present connection, reference should be made. Mrs. Guidera testified that, when her husband approached the defendant after he (deceased) stepped through the gate leading to and from his premises to the sidewalk, and was near the defendant, she observed, before the first shot was fired, that the defendant held a coat on his right arm. While there is no evidence that defendant fired the weapon with his right hand, and, in fact, no evidence as to which of his two hands he used for that purpose, it may be assumed and the court below had the right to assume, from the general and customary, and, indeed, natural manner in which such acts are done, that the defendant used his right hand when discharging the weapon into the body of deceased; and from the circumstance that the defendant held over or on his right arm and hand a coat of some description, the trial court was authorized to infer that the defendant had the weapon with which he did the shooting concealed under the said coat when the deceased approached near enough to him to have observed the weapon if it had been exposed to view in his unconcealed hand. And, if drawing that inference, the court could justly have further drawn the inference that the purpose the defendant had in so concealing the weapon was to keep the deceased in ignorance of the purpose of his (defendant's) presence there until such purpose had been accomplished.

But it is contended by counsel for defendant that the evidence, even though it may tend in a degree to establish the allegation of the complaint, does not measure up to the requirement of the rule in cases such as this in which the issue involves a charge of moral turpitude. The rule referred to is stated by Mr. Jones, in his work on Evidence, vol. 2, § 195, as follows:

"The presumption of innocence obtains in civil as well as in criminal cases; hence, when in a civil action a party is charged with crime, the evidence should be sufficient to overcome the presumption of innocence; that for this purpose more evidence may be necessary than in ordinary cases. * * * To create a preponderance of evidence, the evidence must be sufficient to overcome the presumption of innocence."

[8] The rule, as stated, is undoubtedly sound, but, as a general proposition, it is one that has particular application in the trial of the case in the trial court, and not in the consideration of the case on appeal. Where, either in a civil or criminal case, there is credible evidence, or evidence not inherently improbable, which, to a reviewing court, appears to have justified the verdict or findings, then the question as to the side upon which the preponderance of the evidence lies, or whether the presumption of innocence has been overcome by the requisite degree of proof in such case, is foreclosed by the decision below or the verdict. In other words, where the evidence as disclosed by the record on appeal is such that a reviewing court is legally justified in holding that it is sufficient to support the findings or the verdict, as the case may be, then it must be assumed that as to a civil case the trial court or the jury found upon the question of the preponderance of the evidence in favor of the victorious party, or, as to a criminal case, found that by such evidence the presumption of the innocence of the defendant was dispelled, and his guilt satisfactorily established. The proposition thus stated necessarily follows from the different viewpoints from which questions of fact must be reviewed and determined at nisi prius and by courts of appeal. The latter, in the very nature of things, cannot pass upon the question of the credibility of witnesses, and consequently upon the weight of testimony. That is essentially the sole function of the jury or the trial court.

The books are replete with cases in which the records on appeal show that the evidence upon which the findings and the verdicts are predicated is apparently very slight, and yet such findings and verdicts have been upheld by the appeal courts, because, for the reason stated, it is not within either the province or the power of such courts to determine upon which side in a civil case the evidence preponderates, or whether, in a criminal case, the evidence is such as justly to have persuaded in the minds of the jury the conviction of the defendant's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. In such a case, therefore, as stated, courts of review must leave the question of preponderance or the question of guilt where the court or jury has placed it. So, in the instant case, there being sufficient evidence to support the findings of the trial court, it must be assumed and, indeed, presumed, that, in reaching its decision, as crystallized in its findings the court below was guided by all the tests whereby the weight and evidentiary force of testimony must be determined, and was persuaded to its conclusion by the degree of proof essential in such a case, and which appears to be amply afforded by the evidence.

52 Cal. App. 535

PEOPLE v. DEAN. (Cr. 768.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 6, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 5, 1921.)

1. Criminal law ⊂=448(16)—Conclusion of defrauded party as to whether she parted with title to money inadmissible, but admission not prejudicial.

In a prosecution for obtaining money by false pretenses from a relative, though it was error for the court to allow complainant to answer the question, "Did you at any time part with the title to that money?" such error was harmless to defendant, there being no conflict in the evidence as to the facts by which the defrauded party was induced to part with her money, which clearly showed that she did not part with title.

2. False pretenses ⊂=12—Complainant held not to have parted with title to money.

Where complainant was induced through the trickery of confidence operators, defendant, her relative, and another to deliver into their possession $30,000 of her money, which they were to use in securing back the "identification ticket" of the associate of complainant's relative issued by a certain "Stock Exchange," when in fact there was no such Stock Exchange, and hence no such valid ticket, complainant did not part with title to the money, and defendant, her relative, and his associate were guilty of obtaining money by false pretenses.

3. Criminal law ⊂=1172(7)—Defendant cannot complain of instruction favorable to him.

Where the instructions given by the court fully covered the law of the case, and were even more favorable than defendant was entitled to ask, defendant cannot complain.

4. Criminal law ⊂=424(6)—Evidence as to flight of defendant's companion in crime of false pretenses competent.

In a prosecution for obtaining money by false pretenses, defendant's requested instruction, advising the jury that the flight of defendant's companion in the crime, if shown, was not to be considered in weighing the case against defendant, held properly refused, defendant and his companion having worked in concert, complainant's testimony being competent in so far as showing that defendant's companion made an excuse and left the train while on the way to an appointed meeting place.

5. Criminal law ⊂=1186(4)—Evidence of statement by complainant to defendant in jail not reversible error.

In a prosecution for obtaining money by false pretenses, evidence of the statement of complainant, made to defendant when she talked with him in jail, that if the matter was settled and he got out he would perhaps get $15,000 from his companion in the crime, and go right on with him doing the same thing they had been doing, held harmless error, and not reversible under Const. art. 6, § 4½.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank R. Willis, Judge.

William W. Dean was convicted of obtaining money by false pretenses, and he appeals. Affirmed.

Clare W. Woolwine and H. L. Giesler, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Arthur Keetch, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

JAMES, J. Appeal from a judgment of imprisonment and from an order denying to defendant a new trial. Appellant was found guilty under an indictment charging him with having feloniously stolen and carried away $30,000 lawful money of the United States and the property of Ethel L. Hupp. The evidence in the case tells the very familiar story of the credulity of a confiding victim and the baseness of a class of men who may be catalogued in general as "bunco artists." We may preface our statement of the evidence with the assertion, advisedly made, that the proof was abundant to show a determined and premeditated design, carefully planned and executed, to unlawfully deprive the complainant of a large sum of money.

Early in the year 1919 Mrs. Hupp came to Los Angeles from the city of Dallas, Tex. She was possessed of considerable means in the way of ready money. Dean was her first cousin, Dean's mother being a sister of the mother of Mrs. Hupp. Soon after arriving in Los Angeles the latter settled herself in a home. Dean made his appearance in Los Angeles shortly after Mrs. Hupp's arrival, and presented himself to her, was received into the family circle, and extended the hospitality of the Hupp home. Mrs. Hupp made free to discuss business matters with her cousin, and it was from her that he learned that she had sold her residence property in Dallas for the sum of $48,000, and that she had at least that much money in cash. Being established thoroughly in the confidence of Mrs. Hupp, Dean proceeded, as the evidence shows, to execute with considerable rapidity his plan to fleece his relative. To carry out this design he needed a second party; hence the appearance of a man called Dorchester upon the scene as one of the actors in the scheme of fraud. The preliminary foundation for the introduction of Dorchester was shrewdly laid. Dean one evening at the Hupp house told Mrs. Hupp that he would not accept an offer to accompany the family that evening, because he wanted to go down town, as he had that day caught sight of a Salt Lake friend whom he very much desired to renew acquaintance with; that he had been unable to overtake that friend when he had observed him, so he wished to go to the large hotel that evening and search for him. During the next day or two Dean expressed a desire to meet Mrs. Hupp at the automobile license bureau, where she intended to go, and the time was fixed when he would meet her there. Dean was on hand when Mrs. Hupp arrived at the place designated, and remained outside while she attended to the license business. As she returned, and before the two had started away, Dean suddenly announced that his friend was approaching, and called the man Dorchester over and introduced him to Mrs. Hupp. The three chatted together, Dorchester talking familiarly to Dean about the stock market or stock transactions, and referred to a well-known man of Salt Lake City. Mrs. Hupp testified that Dorchester appeared to be in a hurry, but before leaving he inquired of Dean where he could find the latter, and Dean gave Dorchester Mrs. Hupp's address and telephone number. On the same evening Dean was at the Hupp house, and was about to have dinner with the family and some guests when Dorchester "dropped in." Dorchester drove to the house in a limousine, was attired in evening clothes, and made altogether, according to Mrs. Hupp's description, quite a splendid and impressive appearance. He was still a very busy man and in much of a hurry to keep an evening engagement, so remained but a short while. During the time that Dorchester spent at this appearance, he and Dean talked about stock and stock matters, from which Mrs. Hupp became advised that Dorchester was the representative of a stockbroking firm doing business under the alleged name of "Sheppard & Co." She also heard Dorchester tell Dean that he had worked at the business for many years, and had never taken any one into his confidence, intimating that he possessed some valuable information regarding the stock market; that he was very closely in touch, also, with the wealthy Salt Lake man. The stage had now been well set for the climax, which was arranged to follow, and in which Mrs. Hupp evidently fulfilled all of the expectations of the conspirators as to the manner in which her part should be played. On the following day Dean accompanied Mrs. Hupp downtown; Dorchester happened to meet them while they were in the automobile, and he stopped and chatted with them. The inevitable subject of Dorchester's business and investments in stocks was talked of between Dean and Dorchester, although the two were careful to avoid any suggestion to Mrs. Hupp that she use any of her means to purchase stock. It was to Dean that the valuable advice was given by Dorchester, with the intent, of course, that none of the conversation should be missed by Mrs. Hupp. Dorchester there exhibited to Dean a card which he said was an identification card admitting him to a stock exchange which was afterwards referred to as the "International." The identification ticket, as observed by Mrs. Hupp, had upon it a picture of Dorchester and the latter's name and designation as representative of "Sheppard & Co." After telling Dean about some stock investment that his firm had directed be made, he allowed Dean to take the admittance ticket and go away with it, telling him that he could take it down to the Stock Exchange and get in on it. Dean took the card and came back in about 25 minutes, and then Dorchester told him to go down and make a similar buy to "this," showing him a pink ticket, whereupon Dean went away on his mission to the "Stock Exchange," and later came back. When he returned Dorchester examined the pink ticket in Dean's hand, and simulated great excitement and anger because the identification ticket was not returned. Dean told him that he had done just as Dorchester had advised; that he had left the ticket on the counter; that the man had taken it up and brought back the pink ticket, whereupon Dorchester replied, "I just gave you that ticket to go and buy; I didn't give it to you to give to the man." Thereupon Dorchester evidenced all the outward signs of great anger toward Dean, told him that he, Dorchester, was put in a bad position by involving his firm in the matter, that in order to take up the ticket he would have to get together $40,000; that that would have to be done in a hurry, as the auditor of "Sheppard & Co." (naming a well-known Los Angeles banker, who it is perhaps needless to here state was shown later to have no knowledge of Dorchester or his alleged employers) must have a report on his operations. Dorchester finally said he would wire the Salt Lake gentleman, where he was sure that he could get money, and for them not to worry. Mrs. Hupp thereupon left the two. Later in the day Dean came out to the house and was greatly exercised; said that he had tried to get money to help Dorchester; that Dorchester would lose his position on his, Dean's account, and altogether presented a very excited and worried appearance. To use Mrs. Hupp's language in describing the condition of Dean, that witness said:

> "Yes, he was terribly upset. He said it would be his fault, it was such a bone-headed trick of his doing that, that Mr. Dorchester would lose his position, and he was very much excited and very much worried. He said he didn't know what Dorchester might do to him. Dorchester might kill him. He was very much upset about what might happen to him."

Matters soon progressed to the point where Dean asked Mrs. Hupp if she could not raise the money to help Dorchester out. Dean at that time said that Dorchester had only been able to raise $10,000 in Salt Lake. Again the three met together, and, according to the testimony of Mrs. Hupp, she was told that if she could get $30,000—

"all they needed it for was to go down to this exchange, and it wouldn't take 15 minutes to take it up, to take up this ticket, and he would bring it right back to me; bring my money back. * * * and I should stay in the car until he came back. Dorchester was sitting in the car with him."

And so it was that Mrs. Hupp went to her bank, procured $30,000 in cash, and met Dean and Dorchester. She gave Dean the $30,000, and Dorchester handed to Dean what was pretended at least to be the $10,000 to make up the $40,000. Mrs. Hupp remembered hearing Dorchester say to Dean, which was evidently a part of the stage play, "When you get your money, sell Alaska Gold"; that Dorchester said that he would write it down, and he took out a paper and wrote something on it and gave it to Dean, then told Dean to go through the entrance of a large hotel to the exchange, and shortly thereafter Dean came back. Dorchester asked him if he got the money, and Dean replied, "Yes, I got the money, but they took it away from me again when I bought that Alaska Gold," whereupon Dorchester again assumed an appearance of great wrath and excitement. He had been sitting in the automobile, and he leaped over the side without opening the door, shook Dean and upbraided him for having lost the money. He then took the ticket out of Dean's hand and ran around the corner of the street, while Dean wrung his hands and "cried," saying: "What have I done now? What did I do wrong?" Dorchester soon came back in a disheveled condition, with his collar unbuttoned. As Mrs. Hupp testified:

"He was just raving; and he said he had lost every dollar and that he had lost his firm's money and that he had lost everything he had, and carried on something terrible and acted as though he was going to take Dean's life, and it was just a terrible commotion."

But after this extravaganza had run its course, a way out of the difficulty was thought of. That way, surprising as it may seem, involved the further looting of Mrs. Hupp's strong box, and included the ambitious scheme to get $50,000 more of the latter's money. In short, Dorchester knew of a pending deal in Colorado which required $75,000 to turn; if Mrs. Hupp would produce $50,000 more, the deal could be handled and ample funds received to immediately reimburse her for all the outlay, Dorchester's standing with his firm would be preserved, and the ignominy under which Dean had fallen would be at once relieved. While Mrs. Hupp gave a qualified assent to the plan, she was wise enough not to take the money with her on the trip to Colorado, where she arranged to go together with Dean and Dorchester. Dorchester, while on the train, said that it was necessary for him to stop off at one of the way stations to attend to some matters, but that he would follow on the next train and meet Mrs. Hupp with Dean at a time and place agreed upon in Colorado. After Dorchester had left in this manner, Mrs. Hupp for the first time expressed misgivings as to the honesty of Dorchester, and Dean appeared to give some credit to her impressions along that line. She further took occasion to say to Dean that if she was called upon to use the $50,000 in Colorado, she proposed to stay with the money and see just how and where it was disposed of. Evidently Dean considered the prospect of further mulcting his cousin as having less promise from that point, for he decided that he had better get off at a station ahead and wait for Dorchester and see that he came through all right. Mrs. Hupp agreed. It is almost needless to say that neither Dorchester nor Dean appeared in Colorado at the time appointed. The next meeting between Mrs. Hupp and her cousin Dean occurred in February, 1920, at the Columbus, Ohio, jail, where Dean was being held after arrest on the charge contained in the indictment already referred to herein. A conversation occurred between Mrs. Hupp, Dean, and Dean's mother, in which the mother offered to mortgage a farm for $15,000, and Dean told Mrs. Hupp that if she would take that and let him go "he would sign any sort of notes or agreement, and he would go down on the farm and stay there and work until it was all paid back." Mrs. Hupp responded that she "wouldn't accept money from his mother losing her farm"; that he, Dean, would, if he got free, go right on doing the same thing. It was shown in evidence that comprehensive search had been prosecuted in Los Angeles and New York City to find whether any such exchange existed as the "International," or any such brokerage firm as "Sheppard & Co." None were found to exist in either city. The officer of the bank whose name had been used by Dorchester testified that he did not know Dorchester, and had never heard of "Sheppard & Co.," and had no connection with any such brokerage concern. Throughout the whole operation Mrs. Hupp had been cautioned by the men to keep the matter strictly secret, so that Dorchester's employers might not learn of his "dereliction."

The evidence was sufficient in its every feature to establish the guilt of defendant. The details as already narrated plainly delineate a complete scheme of fraud so bold and palpable as to make it a matter of wonder that a person of reasonable understanding could be deceived thereby. And it is fairly inferable that Mrs. Hupp would not have been despoiled of her money had it not been that Dean was able to bring to bear the weight of his relationship. Complainant was mainly influenced by a desire to relieve her cousin Dean from the embarrassment of having "unwittingly" placed his "friend" in a position of great difficulty. Dean's relationship secured him that degree of confidence of his victim necessary to the execution of the plan.

[1] It was error for the court to allow Mrs. Hupp to answer the question, Did you at any time part with the title to that money?" But the error was not prejudicial; this because there was no conflict in the evidence as to the facts under which the complainant was induced to part with her money. Under those facts it was clear that she did not part with title. She was induced through the trickery of the confidence operators to deliver into their possession the $30,000 which they were to use in securing back Dorchester's "identification ticket" issued by the "stock exchange." There was no such stock exchange; hence no such valid ticket. The conditions did not exist under which the money was to be used. The atmosphere of fraud enveloped the whole transaction. Similar cases are not wanting in the books, for in truth it may be agreed that prospective victims are born every minute. We refer first to In re Clark and Lyons, 34 Cal. App. 440, 167 Pac. 1143, where the court held against the contention that the complainant had parted with title to his property, and so could not prosecute the petitioners for larceny. The further contention there was, as here made, that the money was delivered as a loan. The court in narrating the facts and announcing its conclusions said:

"The case involves the oft-told story of a bucolic and guileless individual, who, while waiting for a train at the Sacramento Railroad station to convey him to his home in a northern town, after a brief sojourn in the central portion of the state, accommodatingly handed over to a brace of oily-tongued strangers $120 of his available cash, as a loan, after the latter had insidiously crept into and gained his confidence and were suddenly awakened to a realization that the freightage on certain freight which they represented that one of them had previously put on board of a freight train had to be prepaid, and that they were without sufficient funds to pay the bill. * * * We are satisfied that the inference is fairly and reasonably justified by the evidence taken before the magistrate that the petitioners, acting in confederation for that purpose, designedly and deliberately, by the artful and crafty methods in which so-called 'confidence men' are adepts, obtained possession of the money of the prosecuting witness, upon the pretext that it was to be a mere loan, with the intent to steal the same. The owner of the money not having parted with the title thereto, the crime, if any, is larceny. People v. Rae, 66 Cal. 423, 56 Am. Rep. 102, 6 Pac. 1; People v. Delbos, 146 Cal. 737, 81 Pac. 131; People v. Arnold, 17 Cal. App. 68, 118 Pac. 729; People v. Schenone, 19 Cal. App. 280, 282, 125 Pac. 758; People v. Ballo, 19 Cal. App. 370, 125 Pac. 1081."

The case of People v. Delbos, 146 Cal. 734, 81 Pac. 131, makes clear the distinction between cases of larceny and those where property is obtained by false pretenses. The decision in People v. Rial, 23 Cal. App. 713, 139 Pac. 661, is also in point, both as to similarity of evidence and character of contentions made. There the victim delivered money to the confidence operators to be bet on a horserace, in a pretended pool room. The pool room was accoutred with all the usual paraphernalia commonly employed by concerns selling pools, including telegraph instruments, which were in apparent operation. All of these accessories were "faked." In considering the appeal in that connection the court said:

"He may have intended that his property should abide the hazard of the races, but the conditions under which he intended in that event to part with his property were not present. Therefore, it cannot be said that he parted with both the possession and title to his property when he intrusted it to the charge of a confidence operator. The decision in the case of Miller v. Commonwealth, 78 Ky. 15, 39 Am. Rep. 194, rested upon facts of a kind similar to those which the evidence illustrates here, and what is there said is particularly applicable to this case."

See, also, People v. Mills Sing, 183 Pac. 865.

[3, 4] The court advised the jury with much care that it must acquit the defendant in the event it found the complainant had parted with title to the $30,000 or made a loan to defendant. It would have been altogether proper for the court to have advised the jury that parting with the possession of money in the manner disclosed, with intent that it be used for the purpose represented, would not in law show a parting with title, where the money never was so used nor intended by the defendant to be so used. Such an instruction would be directly in line with what was said in the opinion in the case last cited. Altogether, the instructions as given by the court were even more favorable than the defendant was entitled to ask. They fully covered the law of the case. The instruction, asked for and refused by the court, which was to advise the jury that the flight of defendant's companion in crime, if such were shown by the evidence, was not to be considered in weighing the case against the defendant, we do not think was a proper one to give to the jury. The men were companions in crime, and they worked in concert. The testimony was certainly competent as given by the complainant showing that Dorchester, after all had been agreed upon a meeting place in Colorado, made an excuse and left the train while on the way, and that neither he nor Dean appeared at the meeting place. All of these circumstances were undoubtedly proper evidence, as showing the complete falsity of the series of acts and various representations made by Dean and Dorchester.

[5] Attention is directed to some other alleged errors as to which it may be said that none are sufficient under the provisions of section 4½, article 6, of the Constitution to warrant the court in reversing the judgment. One of these errors pointed to by appellant is the statement of the complainant as made to appellant when she talked with him at the jail in Ohio. The conversation as narrated by her, in so far as it showed Dean's statements made in the presence of his mother when the latter offered to mortgage her farm and pay $15,000, was altogether proper evidence. The witness, after stating that she there declared that she would not accept "money from his mother losing her farm," added that she had told him that as soon as he got free "he would perhaps get $15,000 from Dorchester, and they would go right on doing the same thing that they had been doing." This latter statement might well have been stricken out in response to the motion of appellant, as it was not shown how Dean received the remark, or whether he made any reply to it. The court, in our opinion, did not unduly restrict appellant in his cross-examination of the witnesses. Upon a careful examination of the entire record we are well satisfied that defendant had a fair trial, and that he was properly convicted of the crime charged in the information.

The judgment and order are affirmed.

PEOPLE v. WOODCOCK. (Cr. 930.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. April 30, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court June 27, 1921.)

1. Perjury ⟸34(5)—Character of corroboration necessary.

In a perjury case, where prosecution relies upon direct testimony of one witness and corroborating circumstances, the character of corroboration necessary is like that in the case of an accomplice under Pen. Code, § 1111, and the corroborating circumstances must be more than evidence tending to prove that the testimony was given, and that it may or may not be false, under Pen. Code, §§ 118, 123, 1103a; Code Civ. Proc. § 1844.

2. Criminal law ⟸511(2)—Character of circumstances necessary to support testimony of accomplice.

It is necessary that evidence corroborating an accomplice shall connect, or tend to connect, the defendant with the commission of the crime, and corroborative evidence is insufficient, where it merely casts a grave suspicion upon the accused, and it must not only show the commission of the offense and the circumstances thereof, but must also implicate the accused in it; and, where the circumstances when proved, taken separately or collectively, are consistent with the innocence of the accused, there is no corroboration, and conviction thereon will be set aside.

3. Perjury ⟸12—Facts and testimony of defendant held not inconsistent.

Testimony of defendant and facts as alleged in an indictment for perjury held not inconsistent.

4. Perjury ⟸12—Testimony and facts held not inconsistent.

In a prosecution for perjury, alleged false testimony of defendant that her husband told her that he and a third person were going to a certain place, and that they would accompany her to the library, was not inconsistent with testimony of the third person to the effect that nothing was said to him or to the husband by the defendant with reference to such witness and the husband going to the place in question.

5. Perjury ⟸33(1)—Held insufficient to sustain conviction.

In a prosecution for perjury, evidence held insufficient to sustain conviction.

6. Perjury ⟸12—Testimony and statement held not inconsistent.

In a prosecution for perjury, testimony of defendant that when she came out of the library she was surprised to find her husband was waiting for her was not inconsistent with a statement made to a police officer: "I went into the library. I was not in the library over 15 minutes. As I came out I met my husband and walked down L. street."

7. Perjury ⟸34(6)—Evidence of witness held not sufficiently corroborated.

In a prosecution for perjury, testimony of witness that defendant was not threatened at the time she made a written statement concerning a homicide in which her husband was involved, and that the statement was voluntary, was not sufficiently corroborated by an assertion in the statement itself that it was made voluntarily and without threat or promise.

8. Perjury ⟸26(1)—Indictment must allege testimony to be false.

An indictment for perjury, alleging that defendant knew the testimony was false, was insufficient where it did not allege that it was in fact false.

9. Criminal law ⟸761(2)—Charge assuming that a certain fact existed held erroneous.

Language in an instruction carrying the inference to the jury that a certain fact existed was erroneous, in view of Const. art. 6, § 19.

10. Perjury ⟸37(1)—Instruction held erroneous.

In a prosecution for perjury, instruction held erroneous as in effect telling the jury that, if they found that the defendant had testified falsely to something with which she was not charged in the indictment, it should find her guilty.

On Application for Hearing in Supreme Court.

11. Perjury ⊜37(4)—Instruction as to corroboration held erroneous.

In a prosecution for perjury, court improperly refused defendant's request to instruct: "No ground of corroboration will be sufficient to justify the conviction of one accused of perjury, where the testimony of the witness to be corroborated is uncertain in negativing the alleged perjurious testimony of the accused. If the testimony of a single witness produced to prove perjury does not prove with certainty and without doubt that a contrary state of facts existed than that shown by the alleged perjurious testimony, the accused must be found not guilty."

12. Criminal law ⊜768(1)—Instruction as to sympathy held proper.

In a prosecution for perjury, the court did not err in charging the jury: "You are further instructed that, although as men you may sympathize with those who suffer, yet, as honest men, bound by your oaths to administer judgment according to the law and the evidence, you should not act upon your sympathies and in contravention of the proof. Mercy does not belong to you. No question of mercy, sentiment, sympathy, compassion, or anything else resides with you," etc.

Lawlor, J., dissenting.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Louis H. Ward, Judge.

Alice Woodcock was convicted of perjury and appeals. Reversed in the District Court of Appeal and Hearing Denied in the Supreme Court.

Connick & Kehoe and James F. Brennan, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

NOURSE, J. Defendant appeals from a judgment of conviction upon nine separate counts charging her with perjury alleged to have been committed by her in the course of her testimony in the trial of her husband upon a charge of murder. The facts of the case are: On the 18th day of September, 1919, the defendant and her husband, Edgar Woodcock, and a friend named Cooper, were walking along Market street in the city and county of San Francisco, in a westerly direction, the defendant walking about 20 feet in advance of her companions. After they had crossed Van Ness avenue, still going west, the defendant was approached by one Kelly, who, she testified, rattled some money in his pocket and endeavored to make her acquaintance, whereupon she turned to her companions, who rushed up to her, and in the altercation which ensued Edgar Woodcock shot and killed Kelly. Edgar Woodcock was thereupon arrested and charged with murder. Defendant immediately went to her home, which was across the street from the place where the shooting occurred. Shortly thereafter three police officers called at her apartment and obtained an oral statement from her. She was thereupon taken to the Hall of Justice, and in the presence of one of these officers signed a written statement, which was prepared by him. From these statements the prosecution, in the case of her husband charged with the murder of Kelly, developed the theory that in accordance with a prearranged plan between the defendant, her husband, and Cooper, the three set out on the streets of San Francisco with the understanding that the defendant should precede her two companions, and that, if she were approached by any strange man, she was to signal to her companions, and they would thereupon come to her assistance and chastise the offending party.

In the course of her examination in the murder case the defendant testified that on the Tuesday preceding the Thursday when the shooting occurred she had told her husband that she had been annoyed by different men as she went to the public library for books in the evening; that her husband scoffed at the idea, and said that if she would go out with him that evening he would satisfy her that such things would not occur; that on the evening of September 18th her husband came home and told her that it would be necessary for him to work that night at the State Mining Bureau in the Ferry building, in the city and county of San Francisco, where he was employed, and that Cooper was going there with him to help him pack an exhibit; that at about 8 o'clock that evening Cooper called at their home at the Crockett apartments on the south side of Market street, and after some conversation about books and authors defendant's husband asked her to get a certain book from the public library at Larkin and McAllister streets; that she objected to going out that evening because, as she said, she was not feeling well, and that her husband urged her to go to the library, saying that he and Cooper would walk over as far as the library with her on the way to the mining bureau; that the three left the apartment, walked across Market street to the north side, and thence easterly along Market street to Larkin, and thence up Larkin street to the public library; that during their walk that evening she went on ahead of her husband and Cooper, who walked together a short distance behind her; that as she passed along Larkin street towards the library a strange man drove an automobile to the curb and invited her to ride with him; that when she got to the intersection of Fulton and Larkin streets he turned his automobile into Fulton street close to the sidewalk, and again asked her to take a ride; that thereupon she turned around to her husband, and on his approaching her she told him that the stranger had spoken to her; that the husband thereupon went to the automobile and slapped the stranger, while she continued on to the library and obtained the book; that on coming out she was surprised to find her husband and Cooper waiting for her, and after some conversation they started home, she preceding her two companions as before and continuing out Market street to the juncture of Market, Haight, and Gough streets, a point about opposite the place where she lived; that she there gave the book which she had procured at the library to her husband, and purchased a magazine at the news stand, and after some conversation relative to the absence of a policeman upon the beat the three determined to walk down Market street again as far as Larkin to see if by any chance any policeman might be upon that beat. This same question had been discussed between the defendant and her husband in their conversation on the Tuesday preceding the day of the shooting, at which time, as the defendant testified, she had told her husband that in all her walks to the library she had never seen a policeman on that beat. The defendant further testified that the three walked down Market street in an easterly direction to Larkin street, where she stopped to look in the window of a store, and when she saw the reflection of her companions she turned and walked back on Market street toward her home; that in the middle of the block between Van Ness avenue and Franklin street the deceased, who was a stranger to her, approached the second time that evening and spoke to her, and that she turned and called to her husband, whereupon he and Cooper ran up to Kelly, and in the encounter between her husband and Kelly the shooting occurred.

The trial of Edgar Woodcock on the charge of murder resulted in a verdict of "not guilty" on December 19, 1919. On the 31st of October, 1919, the defendant, Alice Woodcock, was also accused of the crime of murder growing out of the same state of facts, but was not brought to trial upon that charge. The trial of Edgar Woodcock was followed by indictments charging both Edgar Woodcock and the defendant with perjury committed in the course of the murder trial. Cooper, the other party to the occurrence of September 18th, having left the state immediately after the shooting, was indicted for murder, and returned to the state for the purpose of testifying in an investigation concerning the alleged perjury of the two Woodcocks. He was the principal witness before the grand jury on this investigation and, with a few exceptions which will be hereafter noted, was the only witness at the trial of the defendant on whose testimony the prosecution depended to prove the perjury of the defendant.

As in the murder case, the prosecution in the perjury case proceeded upon the theory that the two Woodcocks and Cooper had entered into a conspiracy whereby they should walk upon the streets of San Francisco, the defendant to precede her two companions so that if she were accosted by any stranger they would take the law in their own hands and chastise the offending party. In support of this theory of conspiracy it was alleged in the indictment that during the course of the trial of Edgar Woodcock for murder it became material to know whether on the evening of the 18th of September, 1919, or prior thereto, there was an arrangement, agreement or understanding between the defendant and her husband or between the defendant, her husband, and Cooper, or between defendant's husband and Cooper, to the effect that the three should go upon the streets of San Francisco, walking in the manner in which they walked that evening, in order that the defendant's companions might chastise any stranger who should accost or offend her. The indictment is divided into 11 counts, each of which it is claimed relates to one charge of perjury. The defendant went to trial before a jury, and was acquitted on the fourth and ninth counts and found guilty on the remaining nine counts of the indictment. The motion for a new trial having been denied, she prosecutes this appeal from the judgment following the verdict.

Before discussing the various counts of the indictment, it is well to advert to the general rules of law relating to perjury and the testimony necessary to convict one of that offense. Section 118 of the Penal Code provides:

"Every person who, having taken an oath that he will testify * * * truly * * * willfully and contrary to such oath, states as true any material matter which he knows to be false, is guilty of perjury."

Section 1103a, of the same Code provides that—

"Perjury must be proved by the testimony of two witnesses, or of one witness and corroborating circumstances."

Section 1844, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that—

"The direct evidence of one witness who is entitled to full credit is sufficient proof of any fact, except perjury and treason."

Section 123 of the Penal Code provides that—

"It is no defense to a prosecution for perjury that the accused did not know the materiality of the false statement made by him; or that it did not, in fact, affect the proceeding in or for which it was made. It is sufficient that it was material, and might have been used to affect such proceeding."

[1, 2] Where, as in this case, the prosecution relies upon the direct testimony of one witness and corroborating circumstances to prove the perjury, the character of corroboration necessary is like that in the case of an accomplice arising under section 1111, Penal Code. In other words, the corroborating circumstances used to support the testimony of a single witness must be more than evidence tending to prove that the testimony was given, and that it may or may not be false. The rule as to the character of corroborating circumstances necessary to support the testimony of an accomplice is well stated in 12 Cyc. at page 456, quoted with approval by the Supreme Court in People v. Robbins, 171 Cal. 466, 470, 154 Pac. 317, 319, as follows:

"'It is necessary that the evidence corroborating an accomplice shall connect or tend to connect the defendant with the commission of the crime. Corroborative evidence is insufficient where it merely casts a grave suspicion upon the accused. It must not only show the commission of the offense and the circumstances thereof, but must also implicate the accused in it. * * * But where the circumstances when proved, taken separately or collectively, are consistent with the innocence of the accused, there is no corroboration, and a verdict of conviction thereon will be set aside.'"

And in the same case the court said (171 Cal. 471, 154 Pac. 319):

"The corroborative evidence required to convict the defendant in addition to that of the accomplice is not sufficient if it merely tends to raise a suspicion of the guilt of the accused. * * * Mere suspicion, as has been shown, will not suffice as corroborative evidence; and where the evidence relied upon as corroborative of the accomplice is, as in the present case, only such as to raise a suspicion of the guilt of the defendant, the verdict must be set aside."

Then again (171 Cal. 476, 154 Pac. 321):

"The proofs of mere suspicious circumstances and of opportunity to commit a crime are never sufficient to justify a conviction upon the testimony of an accomplice. People v. Thompson, 50 Cal. 480; People v. Smith, 98 Cal. 218 [33 Pac. 58]; People v. Koening, 99 Cal. 574, 576 [34 Pac. 238]; State v. Willis, 9 Iowa, 582; People v. Morton, 139 Cal. 725 [73 Pac. 609]." (Emphasis added here.)

In People v. Morton, 139 Cal. 719 at page 724, 73 Pac. 609 at page 611, the Supreme Court quoted with approval from Welden v. State, 10 Tex. App. 400, as follows:

"'We suggest this mode as a proper test: Eliminate from the case the evidence of the accomplice, and then examine the evidence of the other witness or witnesses with the view to ascertain if there be inculpatory evidence—evidence tending to connect the defendant with the offense. If there is, the accomplice is corroborated; if there is no inculpatory evidence, there is no corroboration, though the accomplice may be corroborated in regard to any number of facts sworn to by him.'"

And again, on the same page, the court said:

"In New York, under the same code provision (Code Crim. Proc. § 399), it was said: 'The corroboration, however strong in all other respects, must point to the connection of the defendant with the commission of the crime to be of any avail.' People v. Ryland, 28 Hun, 568, 570." (Emphasis added here.)

There is no essential difference between the provisions of section 1103a of the Penal Code and section 1111 in so far as the law requires that the corroborating evidence "shall tend to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense." Where, as in the present case, the corroborating circumstances are made to take the place of the direct testimony of a second witness, evidence of such corroborating circumstances must, like the testimony of such witness, tend to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense; otherwise the perjury is not proved. Hence the rule of People v. Compton, 123 Cal. 403, 411, 56 Pac. 44, 47, approved in People v. Morton, 139 Cal. 719, 725, 73 Pac. 609, is applicable to a case of this kind. In that case the court had instructed the jury that—

"It is sufficient if such corroborative evidence tends in any way to connect the defendant with the commission of the crime charged."

In rejecting the instruction the Supreme Court said:

"This instruction fails to take account of the essential character necessary to the corroborative evidence, which is that, standing alone, or, as it is phrased in the Code, 'without the aid of the testimony of the accomplice,' it must tend to connect the defendant with the commission of the crime. Here the jury was told that it is sufficient if such corroborative evidence tends in any way to connect the defendant with the commission of the crime. Such is not the law. It could tend to connect him with the crime by considering it with the testimony of the accomplice; yet, if it is necessary so to consider, it would not be legally sufficient. It is legally sufficient only if, standing alone, it tends so to connect him."

First Count.

[3] Two objections are made to the judgment of guilty upon this count: First that the indictment fails to state a public offense: and, second, that the evidence is insufficient to sustain the verdict. Both objections are good.

(1) It is alleged in the indictment that during the course of the trial of Edgar Woodcock for murder it became "material to know" whether on the evening of September 18th and prior to the shooting there was any arrangement, agreement, or understanding between the said defendant Alice Woodcock and the said Edgar Woodcock, or between the said defendant said Edgar Woodcock and Cooper, or between the said Edgar Woodcock and Cooper, to the effect that the said Edgar Woodcock and Cooper, or either of them, were going, or intended to go, to the state mining bureau that night. Also that it became "material to know" whether on that evening and before the shooting anything was said between the said defendant Alice Woodcock and said Edgar Woodcock and said Warren G. Cooper or in the presence of said Warren G. Cooper to the effect that they intended to go to said mining bureau. It is then alleged that after having been sworn as a witness in said trial the defendant Alice Woodcock testified that her husband came home from the mining bureau for dinner, and that when he came in he said:

"Dearie, I will have to go back to the bureau to-night; I have an exhibit to get out for some county fair. * * * Warren Cooper is going down with me to the bureau to-night to help pack the exhibit, because it must be gotten off early in the morning."

She then testified that they were just finishing dinner when Cooper came in, and that "after talking a few minutes with the boys" her husband asked her if she would go to the library to get him a book; that she replied that she did not feel well, and would get the book the next day, but that her husband answered that if she had a headache it was well to go out and take a little walk, and that "Warren and I will walk over as far as the library with you on the way to the bureau." It is then alleged that in truth and in fact there was no arrangement or understanding between the defendant Alice Woodcock and Edgar Woodcock and said Cooper, nor between said Edgar Woodcock and Cooper to the effect that Woodcock and Cooper were going, or intended to go, to the mining bureau on that night, and that in truth and in fact nothing was said between the said defendant and the said Edgar Woodcock and said Cooper to the effect that Woodcock and Cooper intended to go to the bureau, and that nothing was said "between the said defendant Alice Woodcock and said Edgar Woodcock in the presence of said Warren G. Cooper to the effect that the said Edgar Woodcock and said Cooper" intended to go to the bureau that night.

If all that is alleged in the indictment and all that was testified to by the defendant at the trial should be true, there is not a particle of testimony referred to in the indictment which even tends to intimate that Edgar Woodcock and Cooper had "any arrangement, agreement, or understanding" to go to the mining bureau that night. All that the defendant is alleged to have testified to at the trial was that her husband had told her that they would do so. There is therefore no conflict between this portion of the testimony and the state of facts which the indictment alleges was true.

As to the second portion of the testimony alleged to be false, relating to the statement of Edgar Woodcock to his wife that he and Cooper would walk over to the library with her on the way to the bureau, there is no inconsistency between the testimony complained of and the facts alleged to be true. It is not alleged that the defendant testified that this statement was made to her by her husband in the presence of Cooper, or that she at any time testified that there was any arrangement, agreement, or understanding among the three that Cooper and her husband should go to the mining bureau that night. Her testimony was merely that her husband had made that statement to her, and, so far as the indictment is concerned (and this is supported by all the evidence), it was made outside of the presence and hearing of Cooper.

The indictment alleges that nothing was said between the said defendant Alice Woodcock and said Edgar Woodcock in the presence of said Warren G. Cooper to the effect that Cooper and Woodcock intended to go to the mining bureau that night. As at no stage of her testimony did the defendant testify that anything was said between herself and husband in the presence of Cooper regarding their intention to go to the mining bureau, and as the indictment does not even attempt to allege that she did so testify, or endeavor to create that impression, this portion of the count, like those preceding it, fails to allege the commission of any offense.

[4, 5] (2) The evidence presented in support of the allegations of this count is wholly insufficient to sustain the verdict. The evidence upon which the prosecution relied is the testimony of Cooper to the effect that nothing was said to him or to Mr. Woodcock by Mrs. Woodcock with reference to going to the mining bureau that night, and that there was no arrangement between him and Woodcock in reference thereto, and that nothing was said to Mrs. Woodcock in reference thereto in his presence. All this testimony might be true, but it does not falsify any of the testimony of defendant assigned as untrue.

In addition to this, if any portion of the testimony of Cooper could be taken as even remotely falsifying the testimony of the defendant assigned as perjurious in this count, there is not a particle of corroboration of that testimony. All that respondent urges in this behalf is: (a) That Woodcock carried a gun that night when they went on the street; (b) that he and Cooper did not go to the mining bureau; and (c) the fact that they paraded up and down Market street. Taking the test announced in People v. Morton, 139 Cal. 719, 724, 73 Pac. 609, and eliminating from the case the testimony of Cooper—the only witness offered in support of the allegations of the indictment—the question arises, taking these three facts as true, would they tend to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense charged? That is to say, do they tend to prove that she testified falsely when she detailed the conversation between her husband and herself. As to Woodcock's carrying a gun, it was shown that he was a deputy sheriff and entitled to carry one, and that frequently when going out upon the streets at night he first strapped on a gun, and that particularly just a few nights previous to this occasion, when he and Cooper went out for a walk, at a time when the defendant did not accompany them, both Cooper and Woodcock had strapped on guns before they left the apartment. As to the second corroborating fact, it is plain that, no matter what intentions they might have had, the reason that Cooper and Woodcock did not go to the mining bureau that night was that immediately following the shooting they were both taken to the police station and placed under confinement. As to the third alleged corroborating fact—that they paraded up and down Market street—the evidence in this connection could show nothing more than the possible change of plans (if such a plan had been made) following the assault upon the young man in the automobile at Fulton and Larkin streets, which occurred on the first trip from the apartment to the library, a trip upon which both witnesses testified that both Cooper and Woodcock agreed to accompany defendant before they left the apartment.

Second Count.

The portion of the indictment relating to the second count alleges that during the course of the trial of Edgar Woodcock for murder it became material to know whether on the evening the shooting occurred there was an agreement between the three parties to go out upon the public streets on a joint enterprise or undertaking. It is then alleged that defendant testified that, after the defendant left Woodcock and Cooper at the corner of Fulton and Larkin streets, where the assault upon the young man in the automobile occurred, she walked on to and into the public library, and that when she came out of the library she "was surprised to find that Edgar was there waiting for me." It is not alleged that the testimony complained of was material to the subject-matter of the inquiry, or that it might have affected such proceeding.

[6] Assuming, for the time, that the testimony of a witness as to his or her state of mind can be made the basis of an indictment for perjury, the same rules of evidence referred to in the discussion of the first count are applicable here. The defendant testified that when she came out of the library she was surprised to find that her husband was waiting for her. The prosecution claims that this testimony was false, but not a particle of evidence was offered tending to prove its falsity. Even if the evidence of the circumstances be taken as falsifying her testimony of surprise, the prosecution failed to meet the demands of the statute that the direct testimony of one witness at least is necessary to prove perjury. The only defense of the verdict upon this count urged by respondent on this appeal is that the statement of the defendant, made to a police officer immediately following the shooting, is incompatible with the testimony given at the time of her husband's trial. The portion of the statement relied on is:

"I went into the library. I was not in the library over 15 minutes. As I came out I met my husband and I walked down Larkin street."

There is nothing inculpatory in the statement, and nothing therein inconsistent with the testimony assigned in the indictment as perjurious. The allegations of this count went to the jury without any proof.

Third Count.

In the third count of the indictment it is alleged that during the course of the trial of Edgar Woodcock it became material to know what were the reasons which prompted the defendant to walk down Market street the second time after she had purchased a magazine in a store at the corner of Gough and Market streets, and whether the three walked down Market street at that time for the purpose of finding a policeman. The testimony set out in the indictment, and which is alleged to have been false, was to the effect that after the defendant had purchased a magazine in a store at the corner of Gough and Market streets her husband asked if either she or Cooper had seen a policeman during their walk that evening, and that when she told him that she had not he suggested that they walk down Market street again as far as Larkin to see if a policeman was on the beat. It is then alleged: (1) That they did not walk down Market street at that time for the purpose of looking for or finding a policeman; (2) that they did thus walk down Market street in pursuance of a joint enterprise entered into between them previously; (3) that defendant's husband did not ask her or Cooper or either of them whether they had seen a policeman that night; and (4) that defendant's husband did not say to Cooper or defendant or either of them that they should walk back on Market street a second time for the purpose of finding a policeman.

The trial court instructed the jury that though each count contained considerable testimony given by the defendant while she was a witness in the murder case, it was necessary for the prosecution to prove only such parts or portions of the testimony set forth in each count of the indictment as is by each count alleged to be false or untrue. The case was tried upon this theory, yet the indictment does not, as to the third count, allege that any particular portion of the testimony of the defendant was untrue. In order to prove its case under that count it was necessary for the prosecution to show that the three walked down Market street the second time in pursuance of a former understanding, and not for the purpose of looking for a policeman, and that the defendant's husband said nothing to her at that time, either inquiring whether she had seen a policeman or suggesting that they walk down Market street a second time for the purpose of finding a policeman.

The only testimony in support of the allegations in this count is that of Cooper, which attacked the truth of the defendant's testimony only to the extent that he did not hear anything said to the defendant by Woodcock at that time in reference to finding a policeman. This testimony, meager though it is, is weakened by his explanation that as the three stood on the corner something was said about mailing a letter, and that he took the letter across the street and mailed it, and that there was other conversation between Woodcock and the defendant which he did not hear, in fact, that he did not hear most of the conversation between Woodcock and defendant at that time.

As to the assignments relating to the purposes directing their second walk down Market street and the statements made by Woodcock to the defendant beyond the presence and hearing of Cooper, there is no direct evidence to support the allegations of the indictment.

Fifth Count.

[7] In the fifth count it is alleged that during the course of the murder trial it became material to know the reasons why defendant had signed a statement in the presence of a police officer, and whether or not the said statement was substantially true or false. The testimony of the defendant assigned as false was given in answer to a question as to what she had said in that statement. It is as follows:

"Well, that statement appears in this statement of mine, and I was told that unless I made the statement to the police or the detective department that I could not see my husband."

It is then alleged that the said statement had been voluntarily made by the defendant, and that she was not told by a police officer that if she refused to make or sign the statement she would not be allowed to see her husband.

The only witness called to prove the falsity of defendant's testimony was Police Officer Hippely. The only evidence he gave bearing on the subject-matter of the inquiry was in answer to the following question:

"Did you threaten her, or did anybody threaten her, that if she did not sign that statement that she could not see her husband?"

To which he answered, "No, sir." Two other police officers were called to the stand by the prosecution to answer clearly irrelevant, incompetent, and immaterial questions relating to the personal appearance and conduct of the defendant following her husband's arrest, but their attention was not directed to the material inquiry relating to the allegations of this count.

Respondent's only answer to the attack upon this count of the indictment is that the testimony of Officer Hippely was corroborated by that of Dorman and Kennedy and by defendant's own assertion, found in the concluding sentence of her written statement to the effect that it was true and voluntary and made without fear, threat, or promise of reward. As to the testimony of the two police officers, the record clearly shows that they did not and could not corroborate Officer Hippely because they were not present at any time during the taking or signing of the statement. As to the assertion in the statement itself, assuming for the time the correctness of respondent's argument that the statutory demand for two witnesses in a perjury case can be met by balancing the unsworn statement of the defendant against the sworn testimony alleged to be false, a court and jury would be without the common knowledge of men if they held that a statement of this nature demanded by the police from a person in custody was in all cases made voluntarily and without fear, threat, or promise of reward, because it is well known that all persons making a statement to the police while under surveillance are compelled, above all other things, to include that assertion in their statement. People v. Quan Gim Gow, 23 Cal. App. 507, 38 Pac. 918.

Sixth Count.

In this count the indictment alleges that during the course of the murder trial it became material to know the reasons why, on the evening of September 18th, the defendant walked upon the public streets of San Francisco in advance of her husband and Cooper, and whether this manner of walking was not followed in pursuance of an arrangement theretofore had between the defendant and her husband and said Cooper. The indictment contains several pages of testimony alleged to have been given by the defendant during the course of that trial, but does not assign any particular portion of it as false. The nearest approach to an assignment of perjury seems to be that portion of the indictment wherein it is alleged that the defendant testified as follows:

"Q. The three of you [referring to the defendant Alice Woodcock, said Edgar Woodcock, and said Warren G. Cooper] started together; how long did you remain together? A. As I told you yesterday afternoon, Warren Cooper and my husband were having a confidential chat, and rather than obtrude upon the two men I stepped just ahead of them."

It is then alleged that the three did in fact walk upon the public streets that evening in pursuance of an arrangement theretofore had between them that the defendant should walk in advance of her husband and Cooper. It is also alleged that it was not true that they walked in that manner because defendant's husband and Cooper were talking confidentially or because they were talking.

There was no testimony, either direct or circumstantial, in support of the allegations of the indictment contained in this count. The only witness called for the purpose of impeaching the defendant on this issue was Cooper. He testified that as the three came out of the apartment Woodcock told the defendant to go on ahead, and that he and Cooper would follow; that there was no plan relating to the manner of walking organized that he knew of; that nothing was said relating to the manner of walking in the presence of the defendant at any time so far as he knew; and that as they came out of the library Woodcock told his wife to go on as before. There is no possible inference from any portion of Cooper's testimony contradicting the direct testimony of the defendant to the effect that the reason that she walked on ahead of the other two was that they were talking confidentially, and she did not want to interfere with their conversation. There was no evidence tending to prove that she took part in any agreement which the other two might have made relating to their manner of walking that evening, or that Cooper and Woodcock were not in fact talking confidentially, and gave her to understand that that was the reason she was requested to walk ahead. When defendant's counsel, on cross-examination of the witness Cooper, asked the witness if it were true that he and Woodcock were in fact engaged in confidential conversation at that time, the trial court, upon the objection of the district attorney, refused to permit him to answer.

The only evidence cited by respondent as tending to prove the issues upon this count is the assertion found in defendant's written statement, given on the night of her husband's arrest, to the effect that her husband instructed her to go to the library and get a book for him; that he would be right behind her; and that "if any one spoke to me or annoyed me to turn around." But there is nothing inculpatory or inconsistent in this statement of the defendant. It is entirely consistent with the testimony of Cooper that as they reached the street in front of their apartment Woodcock told the defendant to walk on ahead, and that they would follow, but that there was no prearranged plan at any time relating to the particular manner in which they should proceed that night. Outside of the possible inconsistencies appearing in the written statement which the defendant gave to the police, there is neither direct nor circumstantial evidence tending to prove the allegations of this count.

Seventh Count.

In the seventh count of the indictment it is alleged that during the course of the trial of Edgar Woodcock for murder it became material to know whether, on the evening of September 18th, at the time said Edgar Woodcock assaulted a certain young man driving an automobile at Larkin and Grove streets, the said defendant said anything to her husband. The indictment details a portion of the testimony of the defendant, given in the course of the murder trial, to the effect that she did not know how many times her husband struck the young man, but that after he struck him she went on to the library without approaching or speaking to her husband. It is alleged that this testimony was untrue because the defendant did approach her husband, and told him that the young man had been sufficiently punished. It is a fertile imagination indeed that can see any materiality in this testimony affecting the subject-matter at issue in the murder trial. But, passing this, the testimony offered in support of the allegations of this count of the indictment not only fails to falsify this portion of defendant's testimony, but, if anything, proves its truth. Two witnesses were called to falsify the testimony of defendant. The first witness, Cooper, testified that after Woodcock had struck the young man several blows Mrs. Woodcock came up near the crowd of people who had gathered there, and said that she thought the young man had had enough, but that he did not know whether she said that to Woodcock or to himself as she did not come close; that she then turned and went into the library, while he and Woodcock put the young fellow into the machine. He also testified that though the machine was probably 50 or 75 feet east of Larkin on Fulton street he did not see the defendant leave the corner of Larkin and Fulton. The other witness whose testimony respondent cites as corroborating that of Cooper and going to prove the falsity of defendant's testimony was a man by the name of Head. The only portion of his testimony which relates to the allegations of this count is that when he approached the point where the assault was taking place he noticed a woman resembling Mrs. Woodcock standing on the corner of Larkin and Fulton streets, some 50 or 75 feet from where her husband stood, that she did not approach her husband or speak to him, and that after the fracas was over he saw that she was gone. The allegations of this count of the indictment went to the jury without a shred of evidence to sustain them.

Eighth Count.

In the eighth count of the indictment it is alleged that during the course of the trial of Edgar Woodcock it became material to know why the defendant knew that on the evening of September 18th her husband and Cooper were following behind her as they walked along the streets, and whether or not there was any arrangement, agreement, or understanding between them that they should so walk that evening. Testimony of the defendant given at that trial is set forth in this count to the effect that the defendant knew that Cooper and her husband were behind her without turning around from time to time to see whether they followed. Without assigning any of this testimony as false or material, the indictment alleges that Edgar Woodcock instructed the defendant that she should go forth upon the streets, apparently unattended and alone, and that he and Cooper would walk behind and following her, and that an arrangement, agreement, and understanding had been entered into between defendant, her husband, and Cooper to that effect. Though the trial court instructed the jury that only certain portions of the testimony set out in this count were assigned as perjury, the jury was not instructed as to what these certain portions were, and it is impossible to determine that from any analysis of the pleading.

Passing the imperfections of the indictment, it is clear that there is no evidence to support the allegations of this count. Cooper was the only witness called. The only portion of his testimony bearing upon the allegations of this count was that as the three came out of the apartment Woodcock told the defendant to go ahead, and that he and Cooper would follow, but he further testified that "there was no plan organized (as to the manner of their walking) that he knew of." Furthermore, his testimony is uncorroborated.

Tenth Count.

In the tenth count of the indictment it is alleged that during the course of the trial of Edgar Woodcock it became material to know why the defendant, with Cooper and her husband, walked down easterly on Market street the second time on the evening of September 18th, and whether the reason for said walk was for the purpose of finding a policeman. The indictment details a portion of the testimony of the defendant given at that trial to the effect that when they stopped at the corner of Market and Gough streets on their first trip west on Market street they spoke of not having noticed a police officer on the previous trip to the library, and that they then turned and walked east on Market street to see if there were any police officers on the street.

The allegations of this count are practically a duplication of those found in the third count, and the same testimony is relied on by the prosecution to prove the falsity of the testimony of defendant set forth in this count. What has been said in the discussion of the third count concerning the form of the indictment and the testimony of Cooper and the want of corroboration applies equally to the testimony in support of the allegations of this count. Outside of Cooper's testimony that nothing was said in his presence relating to their walking down Market street a second time to see if they could find a police officer, there is neither direct nor circumstantial evidence to sustain the verdict on this count.

Eleventh Count.

[8] In the eleventh count of the indictment it is alleged that in the course of the trial of Edgar Woodcock it became material to know whether or not when defendant approached and stepped off the curb at the corner of Van Ness avenue and Market street on the evening of September 18th she either turned around or looked back or smiled at any man or men. The only portion of the testimony given by the defendant at that trial which is set forth in this count follows:

"Q. Now, did you as you stepped off the curb at the corner of Van Ness avenue and Market street, turn around and look back and smile at any one? A. No, Mr. Brennan; I did not."

Though it is alleged that the defendant knew that this testimony was false, the indictment does not allege that it was in fact false. On the other hand, it is alleged that as the defendant approached the curb at the corner of Van Ness avenue and Market street or approached approximately the said neighborhood or locality, or as she stepped off the curb at the corner of Van Ness avenue and Market street or was in approximately that neighborhood or locality she did turn around and look at men, and smiled at several men.

The record shows beyond doubt that the question and answer assigned in this count were a part of the direct examination of the defendant giving a detailed account of the course taken by the defendant, her husband, and Cooper on the night of September 18th. During this inquiry questions were asked and answers given taking the defendant over the course from the time she left her apartments across Market street, down Market in an easterly direction to Larkin, thence over Larkin to the library, back Larkin to Market, thence west on Market to Gough, thence east again on Market to Larkin, and thence west on Market to the place where the shooting occurred. The question and answer assigned related to the second or last trip west on Market and immediately preceding the shooting.

The witness McLellan, called by the prosecution, testified that he saw the defendant on her first trip west a little after 8 o'clock, and that as two men passed her she was smiling and turned around a little bit. He also testified that about 9 o'clock of the same evening he again saw her going west on Market street, and that while she had a smile on her face she was looking straight ahead. Another witness, Amner, called by the prosecution, testified that either on her first trip east on Market or on her first trip west on Market he saw the defendant smile as she passed the witness McLellan, and that that was the only time he saw her smile that evening. The witness Abbott testified that, while he was standing at the corner of Van Ness avenue and Market street near the water hydrant with the witness McLellan, Edgar Woodcock approached him and asked if they were discussing "that lady"; that he then noticed the defendant some 20 feet in advance as she approached the monument in the center of Van Ness avenue; that as she was passing the monument she looked back, and he could see that there was a smile on her face. Notwithstanding the fact that he had previously testified that he did not see the defendant until after Edgar Woodcock approached and spoke to him while he was standing near the curb, and that she was then some 20 feet in advance of Woodcock, he testified that he saw her just as she left the curb, and that she then had a smile on her face. But, in any event, he was detailing what he saw on the first trip west. The witness Gilger testified that he saw the defendant smile as she passed the cigar store at the corner of Van Ness and Market on her first trip west that evening, and that as she approached the monument in the middle of Van Ness avenue he saw her turn around and look back. The witness Cooper placed the incident of Edgar Woodcock speaking to a street car man as occurring on the first trip west on Market street. In point of time this preceded by about a half hour or more the time concerning which the defendant was testifying in that portion of her examination which is attacked in this count. There is therefore no testimony tending to prove that the defendant, on her second trip west on Market street, as she stepped off the curb at the corner of Van Ness avenue and Market street, turned around and looked back and smiled at any one. The only testimony offered by the prosecution as to what occurred at the time concerning which the defendant testified is the testimony of the witness McLellan to the effect that the second time that the defendant walked west on Market street that evening she was looking straight ahead.

Respondent argues that "perjury consists in the misrepresentation on the witness stand as to facts, by whatever language these facts may be conveyed." On this basis it is contended in effect that when the defendant answered the question relating to her conduct on her second trip west on Market street she was guilty of perjury because she did not go on to explain what had occurred on her first trip, a half hour earlier. But if her testimony was wanted on such fact, the proper course was to ask for it. It was not for the witness to volunteer.

[9] The indictment fails to state sufficient facts in this count and the evidence does not prove the falsity of the testimony assigned.

Appellant assigns numerous errors relating to the instructions to the jury and matters occurring during the course of the trial. Particular criticism is made of the error of the trial court in assuming facts as proved which were not supported by the evidence. For instance, throughout the instructions the court referred to an arrangement, agreement, or understanding between the defendant and Edgar Woodcock and Cooper to the effect that the three should go upon the public streets of San Francisco on a joint enterprise or undertaking on the night of September 18th. This, of course, was the theory of the prosecution in the murder case, but no evidence was offered in support of this theory in the present case. The nearest approach to evidence of that character was the inadmissible testimony of Cooper to the effect that on the afternoon of the 18th of September he and Edgar Woodcock had entered into some arrangement between themselves, but no evidence was offered tending to connect the defendant with any such agreement, arrangement, or understanding. This language in the instructions carried the inference to the jury that the court believed that the existence of such an agreement, arrangement, or understanding had been proved by the prosecution. This was error in view of section 19, article 6, of the Constitution, which provides that judges shall not charge juries with respect to matters of fact. People v. Messersmith, 61 Cal. 246, 248; People v. Williams, 17 Cal. 142, 147; People v. Choynski, 95 Cal. 640, 643, 30 Pac. 791. That prejudice resulted from this instruction is too plain to question, because if the prosecution was unable to prove this theory, its main case fell. With the intimation on the part of the trial court that the facts supporting the prosecution's theory did in fact exist, the inferences which the law permits the jury to draw from the testimony were drawn by the court itself and embodied in the instructions in such a way that the jury must necessarily have assumed that the theory was a fact proved.

[10] Criticism is also made of the instruction to the jury to the effect that if it found that the defendant testified in the murder case in substance and effect that there was an arrangement, agreement, or understanding on the evening of September 18th between Cooper, her husband, and herself, to the effect that Cooper and her husband were going to the mining bureau that evening, and that something was said to that effect between the three, and that if the jury further found that in truth and in fact there was no such arrangement between them, and nothing was said between defendant and her husband in the presence of Cooper relating to their going to the mining bureau that night, then the jury should find the defendant guilty as charged in the first count. The vice of this instruction is that the indictment did not charge the defendant with having testified that there was any arrangement or agreement between the three of them to the effect that Cooper and her husband should go to the mining bureau that night, and did not charge her with having testified that anything was said in regard thereto in Cooper's presence. The court thus instructed the jury that if they found that the defendant had testified falsely to something with which she was not charged in the indictment, it should find her guilty upon this count.

Appellant complains of the special instruction given to the jury in relation to the eleventh count, to the effect that, if the jury found as the defendant approached the curb at the corner of Van Ness avenue and Market street or was in approximately the neighborhood or locality, and that, before the said Edward C. Kelly was shot and killed, she turned around and looked back at a man or men, or smiled at a man or men, the jury should find her guilty. This instruction, like the one first discussed, invades the province of the jury to pass upon the evidence. The defense to this count was that the testimony assigned as perjurious related solely to the second or last trip west on Market street. The testimony offered at the trial of this case related to the first trip west on Market street. It was therefore the province of the jury to determine whether the testimony of the defendant assigned as perjurious did relate to the second trip only, and whether she did in fact on that second trip, while stepping off the curb at the corner of Van Ness avenue and Market street, turn around, look back, and smile at any man. By the court's instructions the jury was told that, if it found that the defendant while in the neighborhood or locality of Van Ness avenue and Market street turned around and smiled at a man or men (not necessarily on her last trip west on Market street or even at any time on the night in question), that fact would prove the falsity of her testimony, and the jury should accordingly find her guilty.

Similar criticism is made of the special instructions relating to the eighth count, wherein the court assumed that the jury could find that there was an arrangement, agreement, and understanding between the three parties to the effect that the defendant should go forth upon the street of San Francisco that night apparently unattended and alone, and that her husband and Cooper would walk behind her, and that the entire course of their walk that evening was in pursuance of that agreement and understanding, though no evidence of such an agreement was presented to the jury. The only evidence offered on this subject was that of Cooper, who in answer to an inquiry as to the arrangement for their manner of walking that evening said "there was no plan organized that he knew of."

Error is assigned in the refusal of the court to give certain instructions requested by the defendant. Some of the matters included in these rejected instructions appeared in the general instructions given by the court. Other matters of importance to the defendant appearing in these instructions were not given to the jury. It would serve no purpose at this time to discuss these various instructions. The trial court apparently did not accept defendant's view of the law as to the quantum of proof necessary in a case of this kind, and as a result the instructions given to the jury are confusing and conflicting upon this subject. Thus the court refused to give to the jury the following instruction requested by defendant:

"No amount of corroboration will be sufficient to justify the conviction of one accused of perjury, where the testimony of the witness to be corroborated is uncertain in negativing the alleged perjurious testimony of the accused. If the testimony of a single witness produced to prove perjury does not prove with certainty and without doubt that a contrary state of facts existed than that shown by the alleged perjurious testimony, the accused must be found not guilty."

This correctly stated the law, and should have been given. 30 Cyc. p. 1455; People v. Smith, 3 Cal. App. 68, 84 Pac. 452.

Criticism is also made of the following instruction:

"You are further instructed that although as men you may sympathize with those who suffer, yet as honest men, bound by your oaths to administer judgment according to the law and the evidence, you should not act upon your sympathies and in contravention of the proof. Mercy does not belong to you. No question of mercy, sentiment, sympathy, compassion, or anything else resides with you. * * *"

This instruction, it is argued, had a prejudicial effect on the minds of the jury. The defendant being the only one on trial, it was for her alone that sympathy or mercy might be expected. To instruct the jury that "mercy does not belong to you" necessarily carried to the jury the impression that the court, believing the defendant guilty and expecting the jury to convict her, could alone extend sympathy or mercy to the defendant.

It is said in argument that these instructions are taken from the cases of People v. Bojorquez, 35 Cal. App. 350, 169 Pac. 922, and People v. Hawes, 98 Cal. 648, 33 Pac. 791. It is true that the latter instruction appears in the decision of the Bojorquez Case, but a reference to the decision would plainly show that the appellate court did not approve it.

Numerous other objections are made to the rulings of the court in sustaining or overruling objections to particular questions, and to the manner assumed by the court in making such rulings as being prejudicial to the appellant. It is unnecessary to consider these objections, as it is not likely that they will again occur.

The defendant here is charged with having given false testimony, certain portions of her testimony being assigned by the prosecution as constituting perjury. Nothing that is said herein should be construed as implying that the testimony which she gave was in fact true. All that is held is that she was not legally convicted.

The judgment is reversed, with instructions to the trial court to grant the defendant a new trial on counts numbered second, third, fifth, and tenth, and to dismiss the indictment as to counts numbered first, sixth, seventh, eighth, and eleventh.

Opinion of Supreme Court, in Bank, Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. [11, 12] The denial of the application for a hearing in this court after decision by the District Court of Appeal of the First Appellate District, Division Two, is not to be taken as indicating that this court concurs in the view of the District Court of Appeal that the trial court erred in refusing the requested instruction quoted in the opinion. This proposed instruction was erroneous, and was properly refused. Nor does this court believe that the giving of the instruction last discussed in the opinion constituted error.

The application for a hearing in this court is denied.

LAWLOR, J. I dissent. None of the points relied upon by the District Court of Appeal for the reversal of the judgment has any substantial merit. The decision is opposed to the well-settled law of this state on questions of pleading, quantum of proof, and instructions in cases of perjury, and is certain to prove a mischievous precedent. It furnishes another instance of purely technical reasoning, which the rule of decision in the Constitution was intended to obviate, totally defeating the ends of justice, for we have before us the statement of the Attorney General that because of the death of Warren Cooper, the principal witness for the state, and of Lester Dorman, the officer in the case, the denial of the petition will end the prosecution.

The petition should be granted.

Ex parte DAVIS. (Cr. 561.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 13, 1921.)

Perjury ⇐11(2)—Testimony of witness in criminal case held material.

Where one had pleaded guilty of murder and sought to withdraw his plea and enter a plea of not guilty on the ground of coercion, threats, etc., alleging in his affidavit that he had been assaulted by a deputy district attorney, false testimony by another witness that a party acting under the sheriff as an armed guard struck such prisoner with his fist was material testimony, since the issue was whether the defendant reasonably feared violence at the hands of such attorney or a mob as alleged, rendering the witness guilty of perjury.

Application of Charles H. Braynard in behalf of George Dewey Davis for writ of habeas corpus to be directed to the sheriff of Shasta county to secure petitioner's release from custody upon a commitment charging perjury. Writ denied.

Martin I. Welsh, of Sacramento, James T. Matlock, of Red Bluff, and C. H. Braynard, of Redding, for petitioner.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., and Jesse W. Carter, Dist. Atty., of Redding, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. This is an application of George Dewey Davis for a writ of habeas corpus.

The petitioner is in custody under a commitment from the justice's court holding him to answer on a charge of perjury.

The alleged false testimony is as follows:

"That Leland Gipson, on or about the 12th day of January, 1921, at Kennett, in the county of Shasta, state of California, while Arthur Owen Davis was handcuffed, [did] strike said Arthur Owen Davis in the face with his fist, and that said George Dewey Davis was standing by the side of said Gipson at the time and saw said blow struck by said Gipson."

It is admitted that there was sufficient evidence of the falsity of the testimony, and the ground urged in support of the application is that such testimony was not material to the matter before the court wherein it was given. To arrive at an intelligent understanding of the objection made, it is necessary to recite briefly the events leading up to the proceeding before the court.

One Arthur Owen Davis was arrested in Shasta county on a charge of murder, alleged to have been committed therein. On his arraignment in the superior court of that county he entered a plea of guilty and was by the court sentenced to be hanged. Thereafter, through his attorney, the defendant gave notice that he would move the court to set aside the judgment rendered against him and to permit him to withdraw his plea of guilty and to enter a plea of not guilty. The notice specified that the motion would be based upon the grounds, among others, that his plea of guilty was induced by "coercion, threats, fear, misapprehension, persuasion, promises, assurances," etc., and that at the hearing the defendant would rely upon his affidavit annexed to the notice, the record in the case, and upon oral evidence to be produced at the hearing. In his affidavit the defendant states, among other things, that he was induced to enter his plea of guilty by "coercion, fear, misapprehension, persuasion, promises, assurances, inadvertence, ignorance," etc., "in the manner following, to wit." The defendant then proceeds to state that he was arrested and taken to the town of Kennett on January 12, 1921; that while there in a room and handcuffed L. E. Smith, a deputy district attorney of the county, called the defendant a vile name and threatened to shoot his head off if he did not plead guilty; that at that time Smith exhibited a gun, handed the defendant a bullet, placed his right hand toward his hip pocket, and assumed a threatening attitude towards the defendant and said, "I will give you your choice, you can plead guilty and we will take you down the road and give you protection or we will turn you over to the mob"; that Smith then hit defendant in the face with his fists, violently pulled him to and fro by his clothes, and said, "I will give you two minutes to plead guilty"; that Smith then looked at his watch and said, "I will give you a minute and a half; now you have just one minute;" that the defendant, fearing he would be injured by Smith and turned over to the mob, said, "Yes; I am the man that shot Reives, and that is my gun;" that Smith then said to defendant, "If you don't plead guilty in court, I am going to sit behind you and am going to blow your head off;" that the defendant was taken to the county jail at Red Bluff, where Smith told him that a mob was coming from Redding and he was then taken to Oroville and from there to Sacramento; that the defendant was arraigned in the superior court of Shasta county on the 20th day of January; and that during arraignment Smith appeared in court.

The Leland Gipson referred to in the testimony alleged to be false seems to have been acting under the sheriff, though not a sworn deputy. He was armed and apparently acting as a guard. The petitioner in his testimony given on the hearing of the motion in the murder case stated that Gipson struck Arthur Owen Davis after the latter had confessed to the murder, but it was eight days before the arraignment and plea of guilty in the superior court.

Was the testimony material? The notice and affidavit tendered the issue that at the very time of his arraignment he believed and had reasonable cause to believe that he would suffer violence at the hands of Smith or of a mob if he did not plead guilty. The notice and affidavit constituted the defendant's pleading. They shaped the issues and limited the inquiry to the issues so framed. The affidavit further, and not improperly, stated facts in support of the issue tendered, facts which are, some of them at least, evidentiary. Such affidavits not only form a part of the defendant's pleading, but are admissible as evidence in support of his motion. In so far as the affidavit states merely evidentiary matter it does not limit the scope of the inquiry. The issue was whether the defendant reasonably feared violence at the hands of Smith or a mob. All the facts and circumstances tending to throw light on that subject, were admissible in evidence. The question was whether such facts and circumstances, when considered together, formed a basis for such reasonable apprehension of violence as to force from the defendant an involuntary plea of guilty. Alexander v. State, 20 Wyo. 241, 123 Pac. 71, Ann. Cas. 1915A, 1282. The state of his mind at the time he entered his plea was the fact to be ascertained. Was he probably influenced by the alleged conduct and threats of Smith? The question must be determined from his treatment at the hands of the officers and others and the protection or lack of protection thrown around him. A threat against a prisoner in the hands of officers faithfully discharging their duty of protecting him would not have the significance of the same threat against him where the officers were faithless to such duty. If, after striking and threatening a handcuffed prisoner, a sworn officer of the law willingly permits another, in his presence, to attack the prisoner, such conduct would reasonably tend to prove that there was danger of the threats being carried into execution. The testimony of the petitioner was clearly material to the matter under investigation by the court.

"The matter sworn to need not be directly and immediately material. It is sufficient if it be so connected with the fact directly in issue as to have a legitimate tendency to prove or disprove such fact by giving weight or probability to the testimony of a witness testifying thereto, or otherwise." 22 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 687; People v. Senegram, 27 Cal. App. 303, 149 Pac. 786; People v. Metzler, 21 Cal. App. 82, 130 Pac. 1192; People v. Barry, 63 Cal. 63; 21 R. C. L. 259; State v. Sargood, 80 Vt. 415, 68 Atl. 49, 130 Am. St. Rep. 995, 13 Ann. Cas. 367.

"The ordinary test of materiality is whether the testimony given could have probably influenced the tribunal before whom the case was being tried, upon the issue involved therein. If it tended so to do, it was material, and the degree of materiality is of no importance. * * * It may be laid down as a general rule that any testimony which is relevant in the trial of a given case is so far material to the issue as to render a witness who knowingly and willfully falsifies in giving it guilty of the crime of perjury." State v. Miller, 26 R. I. 282, 58 Atl. 884, 3 Ann. Cas. 943; State v. Moran, 216 Mo. 550, 115 S. W. 1130; Ex parte Metcalf, 8 Okl. Cr. 605, 129 Pac. 680, 44 L. R. A. (N. S.) 513; Coleman v. State, 6 Okl. Cr. 252, 118 Pac. 594.

In the petitioner's closing brief, filed herein May 11th, it is suggested that the complaint does not allege that the testimony given was material. It cannot be said that the complaint wholly fails to allege facts showing that the testimony set out was material and this proceeding cannot serve the office of a demurrer or appeal. In re Johnson, 6 Cal. App. 734, 93 Pac. 199; Ex parte Kaster, 198 Pac. 1031.

The prayer of the petition is denied, and the writ is discharged.

GRAY et al. v. BEKINS et ux. (S. F. 7637.)

1. Contracts ⊜324(1)—When party who has not fully performed contract can sue thereon.

Under Civ. Code, §§ 1511, 1512, 1514, a party who has contracted to perform an act for an agreed consideration can maintain an action upon the contract even though he himself has failed to fully perform it, if performance on his part was prevented by operation of law, the act of the other party to the contract, the act of God, or the public enemy.

2. Work and labor ⊜14(1)—Party not prevented by other party from performing may not sue on contract, but for reasonable value.

If one party to the contract has not actually prevented performance, but has merely committed a breach of the contract, the other party, where he has not fully performed, cannot maintain a suit upon the contract, but may treat the contract as terminated, and sue for the reasonable value of that which he furnished under the contract.

3. Work and labor ⊜24(1)—Building contractors suing for value of labor and materials not required to prove performance or acts rendering performance impossible.

Where building contractors, on owner's breach of contract, treated the contract as rescinded and sued for the reasonable value of labor performed and materials furnished, it was unnecessary to allege or prove full performance on their part, or acts which rendered performance impossible.

4. Contracts ⊜303(4) — Covenants entitling contractor to proceed with work without interference by owner implied in absence of express covenants.

Covenants that contractor shall be permitted to proceed with the construction of the building in accordance with the terms of the contract, without interference by the owner, and shall be given such possession as will enable him to adequately carry on the construction and complete the work, will be necessarily implied from the building contract, in the absence of express covenants.

5. Contracts ⊜303(5)—Provision for apportionment of loss in event of partial destruction by earthquake did not relieve contractor from performing contract in such event.

Provision of building contract for an apportionment of the loss between owner and contractor in the event of a partial destruction by earthquake did not relieve the contractor from performing the contract in such event.

6. Contracts ⊜306(3)—Provision authorizing owner to supply contractor with men and material did not authorize him to take charge of work.

Provision of building contract authorizing owner to supply contractor with men and material necessary to complete the work in the time required by the contract, if contractor failed to make adequate provisions after specified notice by the owner, did not authorize the owner to take charge of the work himself on the contractor's failure to provide the necessary men and material, but merely permitted the owner to furnish the men and material for the contractor's use.

7. Contracts ⊜317—Owner's notice to contractor to furnish labor and material given after owner's violation of contract ineffectual.

Owner's notice to contractor to provide adequate men and material, under provision of the contract authorizing the owner to furnish men and material on contractor's failure to make adequate provisions after three days' notice by owner, was ineffectual where prior to giving such notice the owner had violated the contract by taking possession of the building and assuming charge of the work.

8. Work and labor ⊜14(1) — On owner's breach contractor may treat contract as terminated, and sue for value.

Action of owner in taking charge of the completion of a partly constructed building, in the absence of an abandonment of the work by the contractor, and in occupying the portion of the building completed, without the contractor's consent, was a breach of the contract entitling the contractor to treat the contract as terminated, and to sue for the value of the labor and material furnished.

9. Appeal and error ⊜1071(6)—Failure to find on issues not affecting plaintiff's rights immaterial.

In contractor's action for value of labor and material furnished, following the owner's breach of the contract prior to completion of the building, court's failure to find on issues as to the acts and expenditures of the owner subsequent to his breach of the contract held immaterial, since such acts and expenditures could have had no effect upon the contractor's right to recover the reasonable value of things furnished prior to the breach.

10. Work and labor ⊜27(3)—Provisions of contract immaterial in contractor's action for value of labor and material furnished prior to owner's breach.

Where contractor's action, following owner's breach of the contract prior to completion of the building, was not based upon the contract, but was an action for the value of labor and material furnished prior to owner's breach, it was immaterial that the contract entitled the contractors to only three-fourths of the value of the work performed by them prior to the completion of the building, and provided that the contractors and owners were to share the expenses of repairing damages caused by earthquake.

11. Evidence ⊜471(24) — Testimony as to whether owner's occupancy of partially constructed building interfered with work of contractors held admissible.

In contractors' action against owner for value of labor and material furnished prior to completion of building, in which it was claimed that the owner violated the contract by occupying a portion of the building completed, testimony of a witness as to whether the occupancy of the building by the owner interfered with the contractors in the erection of the building held admissible, as against contention that it called for a conclusion, the element of observation entering into the testimony sufficiently to dispel objections to the element of inference.

12. Work and labor ⊂=27(1) — Exclusion of testimony whether owner's occupancy of partially constructed building interfered with work of men employed by owner held not error.

In contractor's action for value of labor and material furnished, against owner who was claimed to have violated the contract by occupying the building when partially constructed, and by taking charge of completion thereof, exclusion of testimony as to whether owner's occupancy interfered with the work of the men employed by the owner held not reversible error, in absence of showing that the men were working under the same conditions or performing the same work that would have been required of contractors under the contract.

13. Appeal and error ⊂=1058(2)—Exclusion of testimony subsequently admitted harmless.

Exclusion of testimony subsequently given by the witnesses held harmless.

14. Interest ⊂=45 — Allowed from time sum becomes due if it is certain or can be made certain by calculation.

Generally, interest is allowed from the time the sum becomes due if the amount is certain or can be made certain by mere calculation, under Civ. Code, § 3302.

15. Work and labor ⊂=29(1)—Interest is recoverable from time when amount was due, where amount was known and admitted.

Interest is due from the time when the amount in suit becomes due, where exact amount was known to and admitted by defendants, even though the action is one in quantum meruit.

16. Work and labor ⊂=29(1)—Contractors entitled to interest on amount due for labor and material from date of filing of answer admitting value.

In contractors' action for value of labor and material furnished, in which the owners admitted in their answer that the contractors had furnished labor and material in the value of amount subsequently allowed contractors by the judgment, but denied liability therefor, the contractors were entitled to interest on such amount from the date of the filing of the answer.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John J. Van Nostrand, Judge.

Action by G. F. Gray and H. N. Gray, copartners doing business under the firm name and style of Gray Bros., against Martin Bekins and wife. Judgment for plaintiffs, and from the whole thereof defendants appeal, and from that portion which allowed plaintiffs interest on the amount of the judgment only from the date of entry of judgment, plaintiffs appeal. This judgment was reversed by the District Court of Appeal, and on hearing in the Supreme Court the judgment of the superior court was affirmed, and cause remanded, with instructions to allow plaintiffs interest from date of filing of answer.

J. E. Manning and Ames & Manning, all of San Francisco, for appellants.

Wm. H. Chapman and Edwin L. Forster, both of San Francisco, for respondents.

LENNON, J. The partial destruction of an unfinished building by an earthquake on April 18, 1906, engendered the controversy which culminated in the present action. Plaintiffs had constructed the first and second stories of a six-story brick and concrete warehouse, which they had contracted to build for defendants, when the portions erected were damaged by earthquake on the date above mentioned. When plaintiff H. N. Gray, defendant Martin Bekins, the architect, and brick contractor met at the building a few weeks after the earthquake, and examined the structure to ascertain the damages, it was decided that some repairing was necessary. The exact amount of repairing was not determined, but there is testimony that it was decided that, before any further work was performed by plaintiffs, the building inspector of the board of public works of San Francisco should pass upon the extent of repairing to be done, so that any subsequent controversy with the board might be avoided.

Plaintiff H. N. Gray testified that it was agreed that, before plaintiffs proceeded with the work, the examination by the building inspector should be procured by defendants, and that the latter should inform plaintiffs of the result. The next information plaintiffs received after the meeting of the parties at the building above referred to was in the following month of June, when plaintiff H. N. Gray drove to the building, and for the first time discovered men taking down the brickwork and cleaning the brick, although plaintiffs had not authorized any one to tear down or demolish any portion of the building. Plaintiffs thereupon wrote a letter to the architect, dated June 29, 1906, containing a notification that, by tearing down portions of the brick work without plaintiffs' consent, defendant had broken and terminated the contract with plaintiffs. The architect delivered this letter to defendants. The next word received by plaintiffs was a communication from defendants, dated August 14, 1906, notifying plaintiffs that, unless they immediately repaired the damages caused by the earthquake, defendants would make the repairs and charge plaintiffs with a proportionate share thereof. After the receipt of this letter, plaintiff H. N. Gray again went to the building, and, finding that a considerable amount of repairing had already been performed by defendants, declined to proceed under the contract. It also appears from the testimony that, continuously after the earthquake, the first floor of the building was occupied by the "Bekins Van & Storage Company"; an office for the company had been established in the building, a sign bearing the name of the company was on the front of the building, and several van loads of furniture were stored in the building. Neither plaintiffs nor the brick contractor gave permission to any one to occupy any portion of the structure.

In August, 1906, plaintiffs instituted the present action for the recovery of $6,242.03, the difference between $13,742.03, the value of the work performed on the building by plaintiffs up to April 18, 1906, and $7,500, the sum alleged by plaintiffs to have been paid by defendants. The complaint contains three causes of action. In the first cause of action it is alleged that defendants prevented the performance of the contract by the acts above set forth. The second and third counts omit all reference to the contract and are respectively in indebitatus assumpsit and quantum meruit. Defendants' answer denies that performance of the contract was prevented by defendants, admits the value of the work performed by plaintiffs was $13,742.03, and alleges that $10,485 of this sum has been paid, alleging, by way of a special defense and counterclaim, that the contract provides that the sum paid should at no time during the progress of the work exceed three-fourths of the value of the work done and therefore the sum paid by defendants to plaintiffs was in excess of the amount due, and that, by the terms of the contract, plaintiffs are liable to defendants for a proportionate share of the sum expended by defendants in repairs. Defendants seek to recover a judgment against plaintiffs for $654.75.

The trial court found, among other things, that defendants rendered it impracticable and impossible for plaintiffs to proceed with the construction of the building by taking possession of and occupying the unfinished building as a warehouse and by tearing down and demolishing large portions of the unfinished warehouse, all without authority or consent from plaintiffs. The court further found that $13,742.03 was the value of labor and material furnished by plaintiffs in the construction of the warehouse, of which sum $10,485 had been paid plaintiffs by defendants, and rendered judgment in favor of plaintiffs for the sum of $3,257.03. Defendants appeal from the whole of the judgment, and plaintiffs appeal from that portion which allows plaintiff interest on the amount of the judgment only from the date of the entry of the judgment.

[1, 2] The main point advanced by defendants is that plaintiffs failed to allege or prove full performance or facts excusing performance by plaintiffs. A party who has contracted to perform an act for an agreed consideration can maintain an action upon the contract even though he himself has failed to fully perform if performance on his part was prevented by operation of law, the act of the other party to the contract, the act of God, or of the public enemy. Civ. Code, §§ 1511, 1512, 1514. If the other party to the contract has not actually prevented performance but has merely committed a breach of the contract, the party who has not fully performed the act agreed upon cannot maintain a suit upon the contract, but may treat the contract as terminated and sue for the reasonable value of that which he furnished under the contract. Cox v. McLaughlin, 76 Cal. 70, 18 Pac. 100, 9 Am. St. Rep. 164; Carlson v. Sheehan, 157 Cal. 692, 696, 109 Pac. 29; Connell v. Higgins, 170 Cal. 541, 150 Pac. 769.

[3] In the instant case plaintiffs have treated the contract as rescinded, and are suing for the reasonable value of labor performed and materials furnished, and it was therefore unnecessary to allege or prove full performance on their part or acts which rendered performance impossible. If defendants violated the contract by the commission of the acts alleged, plaintiffs can recover the reasonable value of the work performed and materials furnished by them, less any sums already paid by defendants.

[4] In every building contract which contains no express covenants on the subjects there are implied covenants to the effect that the contractor shall be permitted to proceed with the construction of the building in accordance with the other terms of the contract without interference by the owner, and that he shall be given such possession of the premises as will enable him to adequately carry on the construction and complete the work agreed upon. Such terms are necessarily implied from the very nature of the contract, and a failure to observe them, not consented to by the contractor, constitutes a breach of contract on the part of the owner entitling the contractor to rescind, although it may not amount to a technical prevention of performance.

[5-7] In the instant case the contract provided for an apportionment of loss between owner and contractor in the event of a partial destruction by earthquake, but the contractor was not thereby relieved from performing the contract, nor did the contract require or authorize the owner to take possession of the building and repair the same in the event of a partial destruction. There was a provision in the contract authorizing the owner to supply the contractor with the men and material necessary to complete the work in the time required by the contract if the contractor failed to make adequate provisions along these lines after three days' notice by the owner. However, the effect of this provision was to permit the owner to furnish men and material for the contractor's use only; it did not authorize the owner to take charge of the work himself. American-Hawaiian Eng., etc., Co. v. Butler, 165 Cal. 497, 133 Pac. 280, Ann. Cas. 1916C, 44. Moreover, the only notice from defendants to plaintiffs was the notice of August 14, 1906, which was ineffectual for any purpose in view of the fact that, long before this notice, defendants had taken possession of the building and assumed charge of the work. The contractor was under the same obligation to continue and complete the building after the partial destruction as before, and the right to proceed with the construction free from interference by the owner likewise continued.

As previously stated, there is testimony to the effect that plaintiffs never at any time authorized defendants to assume charge of the repairing, but that it was agreed that work should cease until defendants had obtained an inspection of the building and notified plaintiffs of the result. Plaintiffs were never notified of the report of the building inspector, nor were they informed that defendants desired plaintiffs to proceed, notwithstanding the agreement. Without notifying plaintiffs in any way whatsoever, or obtaining consent in any form, defendants proceeded to demolish portions of the structure, and, by thus ignoring the contractor's right to continue with the construction of the building and by undertaking to perform the acts due from the contractor, in the absence of an abandonment of the work by the contractor, defendants violated the contract.

[8] Likewise the occupancy of the building by defendants as a warehouse, without plaintiffs' consent was a breach of plaintiffs' rights under the contract. By reason of these violations, plaintiffs were entitled to treat the contract as terminated and sue for the value of what they had furnished. Adams v. Burbank, 103 Cal. 646, 37 Pac. 640.

Defendants next attack certain findings of the trial court. It may be stated that the evidence upon the question of the extent of the occupancy of the building by defendants subsequent to April 18, 1906, as well as the evidence upon the question of plaintiffs' consent to defendants' acts, was conflicting. Upon these issues we have merely set forth the evidence in favor of plaintiffs upon which the findings were based, for that part of the conflicting testimony credited by the trial court constitutes the facts of the case for the purpose of this appeal.

The findings of the trial court are to the effect that defendants, without plaintiffs' consent, took possession of the building about April 25, 1906, occupied the same as a warehouse and have ever since continued to so occupy it; that they demolished portions of the said building without authority or consent from plaintiffs, and that, until these acts of defendants, plaintiffs performed all conditions of the contract upon their part. These findings, together with findings of the value of the work performed and material furnished and the amount thereof remaining unpaid, were sufficient to support a judgment in favor of plaintiffs for the latter sum. The finding that the acts in question prevented performance by plaintiffs, complained of by defendants, is immaterial, and may be regarded as surplusage, for, upon the theory on which the action was brought, plaintiffs were not required to prove performance was rendered impossible.

[9] Defendants claim that the decision is against law, in that the court failed to find on certain issues raised by defendants' special defense. From what has been said it is evident that the findings in effect sufficiently cover the allegations of the defendants' special defense that plaintiffs refused to complete the contract, although defendants had performed all the conditions required of them by the contract. Those allegations of the defense which are not covered by the findings are allegations with reference to defendants' demand upon plaintiffs in August and October, 1906, to complete the warehouse, and allegations concerning the expenditures of defendants in repairing the building. The judgment cannot be disturbed for failure to find on these issues. Mission Brewing Co. v. Rickert, 39 Cal. App. 668–672, 179 Pac. 720. Findings upon these issues, even if in defendants' favor, would not alter the result, for the acts and expenditures of defendants subsequent to their breach of the contract can have no effect upon plaintiffs' right to recover the reasonable value of things furnished by them prior to the breach.

[10] The facts that under the terms of the contract plaintiffs could demand only three-fourths of the value of the work performed by them until the building was completed, and that they were to share the expenses of repairing damages caused by earthquake can have no effect upon the judgment in this case. The plaintiffs have not sued upon the contract and the provisions of the contract do not control, for defendants cannot ignore their own obligations under the contract and, at the same time, seek to hold plaintiffs to its terms. Adams v. Burbank, 103 Cal. 646, 650, 37 Pac. 640; Keeling v. Schastey, 18 Cal. App. 764, 768, 124 Pac. 445; Tubbs v. Delillo, 19 Cal. App. 612, 127 Pac. 514.

[11] A witness called in behalf of plaintiffs was asked if the occupancy of the property by defendants in the manner described was such as to interfere with the contractors in the erection of the building. An objection upon the ground that the question called for a conclusion of the witness was overruled, and the ruling is assigned as error by defendants. The question does not require a pure conclusion, but a combination of observation and inference on the part of the witness, and the element of observation enters into the testimony called for to a sufficient degree to dispel the objections to the element of inference. 22 C. J. § 611; McCormick Mach. Co. v. Burandt, 136 Ill. 170, 26 N. E. 588.

[12, 13] Two witnesses for defendants were asked on direct examination whether defendants' occupancy interfered with the work of the men employed by defendants to repair the structure. Defendants complain because an objection to the question was sustained. The ruling does not constitute reversible error. As stated in the objection, it was irrelevant whether the men employed by defendants were interfered with or not, for it does not appear that these men were working under the same conditions or performing the same work that would have been required of plaintiffs under the contract. A witness for defendants was asked whether or not, at the meeting of the parties at the building, shortly after the earthquake, he heard plaintiff H. N. Gray say anything with reference to taking down or rebuilding any portion of the building or in regard to completing the building. Objections to the questions on the ground that they were leading were sustained. Even if the sustaining of the objections was erroneous, defendants were not prejudiced thereby, for it appears that the witness subsequently gave the testimony called for by the questions.

As previously stated, plaintiffs also appeal from the judgment, and that appeal is grounded in the contention that, inasmuch as there was not at any time any dispute as to the value of the work performed and materials furnished by the plaintiffs, the sum to which the plaintiffs are entitled was liquidated and certain, and that therefore the plaintiffs should have been allowed interest on the amount of the judgment from the date of the commencement of the action.

The value of the labor performed and materials furnished by plaintiffs in the construction of the warehouse was expressly admitted in the answer of the defendants to be the sum of $13,742.03, as pleaded in the plaintiffs' complaint. Plaintiffs' complaint alleged that only $7,500 had been paid for and on account of such labor and materials, while the defendants' answer pleaded that they had paid the sum of $10,485, and, in effect, admitted that they were indebted to the plaintiffs in the sum of $3,257.03, which was the difference between the admitted value of plaintiffs' work and materials furnished and the sum alleged to have been paid on account thereof. In this behalf the trial court found in accord with the allegations of the defendants' answer.

[14, 15] The general rule is that interest is allowable from the time the sum in suit becomes due if the same is certain or can be made certain by mere calculation. In actions upon contracts the sum due or the means of calculating the sum are usually clearly provided for in the contract and interest is consequently allowable from the time the sum in suit becomes due. (Civ. Code, § 3302; Fairchild v. Bay Point etc. R. R. Co., 22 Cal. App. 328, 134 Pac. 338.) True, the action here is one in quantum meruit, but even so, if the exact amount of the indebtedness due the plaintiffs was known to and admitted by the defendants, the parties to be charged, the reason for refusing interest until the amount due is made certain by evidence no longer obtains. Cox v. McLaughlin, 76 Cal. 60, 18 Pac. 100, 9 Am. St. Rep. 164; Courteney v. Standard Box Co., 16 Cal. App. 600, 117 Pac. 778.

[16] The test, then, to be applied in the instant case is whether or not the exact sum found to be due was known and admitted by the defendants to be due to the plaintiffs. We are of the opinion that the allegations of the defendants' answer in the particulars previously pointed out constituted an acknowledgment of plaintiffs' claim, to the extent of the sum therein admitted, and by the trial court found to be due to the plaintiffs. In short, the admission of the defendants' answer in this behalf was tantamount to an ascertainment of the balance found to be due the plaintiffs and consequently interest should have been allowed thereon from the date of the filing of the answer, namely, March 27, 1907. Skinker v. Clute, 9 Nev. 342.

It follows from what has been said that the judgment against the defendants must be, and it is hereby, affirmed. It likewise follows that the judgment allowing interest to the plaintiffs only from the date of the entry of the judgment was erroneous, and it is therefore ordered, upon the appeal of the plaintiffs, that said judgment be modified by allowing to the plaintiffs interest on the amount found due from the date of the filing of the defendants' answer, and the cause is remanded to the court below for the purpose of ascertaining said interest, and thereupon entering judgment for the plaintiffs accordingly.

We concur: ANGELLOTTI, C. J.; OLNEY, J.; SLOANE, J.; WILBUR, J.; SHAW, J.; LAWLOR, J.

WILSON v. BEAZLEY. (L. A. 5920.)

1. Vendor and purchaser ⟸110 — Delay of vendor in tendering deed on offer to pay balance of price held not ground for rescission.

Where contract for sale of land provided that the vendor should convey title on payment in full at maturity of any installment of the price, and the purchaser, without giving notice to the vendor that he intended to exercise his option to pay the balance of the price, tendered the full amount on an installment day, and demanded a deed, a delay of five days in tendering title papers was not so unreasonable as to give the purchaser ground for rescission.

2. Vendor and purchaser ⟸114—Easement in land as a ground for rescission by vendee is waived by such vendee by his joining in the grant of a supplemental easement.

Where an easement in land prevents the vendor from giving a good title according to a contract of sale, a vendee in possession does not waive his right of rescission by continuing in possession of the land, but, by a grant of an easement supplemental to the one already in existence, he waives his objections to the first easement.

3. Vendor and purchaser ⟸119—Delay held to defeat right to rescission by injury to property.

A delay of one year after damage to the property by floods will defeat a purchaser's right to rescind.

4. Vendor and purchaser ⟸117—Damage to land by vendee prevents his rescission.

Where the vendee has damaged land by removing soil and an orchard, he cannot rescind for injury to the property by floods, since he cannot return to the vendor what he has received under the contract.

5. Vendor and purchaser ⟸114 — Tendering remainder of purchase price and demanding deed by vendee waives right to rescind contract of purchase.

Although real estate was damaged enough by floods to give vendee a right to rescind the contract, where, after such injury, he tendered the remainder of the purchase price and demanded a deed, he waived his right to rescind.

6. Vendor and purchaser ⟸214(6)—A vendor may not enforce specific performance of executory contract against an assignee of the vendee.

Although defendant, assignee of the vendee of an executory contract for the sale of land, wrote below the assignment of the contract that he agreed to accept it, and signed it, yet, such writing and signing having been made without consideration after the assignment was complete, and without the knowledge of either assignor or vendor, he is not liable to the vendor in a cross-complaint for specific performance, Civ. Code, § 1589, providing that a voluntary acceptance of the benefit of a transaction is equivalent to a consent to all the obligations arising from it, being applicable to an assignee only when all the benefits of a full performance by the vendor have inured to the assignee.

7. Vendor and purchaser ⟸214(6)—Assignee of vendee held not liable on executory contract.

Where contract for sale of land is executory, the performance of acts by the assignee of the vendee causing depreciation in the value of the property can have no further effect than to render him liable in an action for damages, and does not create a contractual relation between the assignee and the vendor or personal liability by the assignor to the vendor; nor would such a contractual relation be established by the assignee's tender of the purchase price.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Russ Avery, Judge.

Action by Philip L. Wilson against E. E. Beazley, in which defendant filed a cross-complaint. Judgment for defendant on both complaint and cross-complaint, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed as to judgment on complaint; reversed as to judgment on cross-complaint.

Newlin & Ashburn, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

R. Y. Williams and A. W. Rutan, both of Santa Ana, for respondent.

LENNON, J. Plaintiff and cross-defendant appeals from a judgment rendered against him upon both complaint and cross-complaint. The contract out of which the present action arose was an agreement for the sale of real property executed December 1, 1911, by defendant Beazley, as owner, and O. H. and Rachel M. Embree, as purchasers. By the terms of this contract the vendees agreed to pay the sum of $8,000 in $1,000 annual installments, with interest on deferred payments payable annually on the 1st of December, and to pay all taxes and assessments that might thereafter become due on the premises. The right was reserved to the vendees "of making partial payments in any sums above the stipulated amounts before mentioned on any interest bearing date." The vendor contracted to execute and deliver, upon receipt of these payments, as called for, a good and sufficient deed of the premises, and to furnish an unlimited certificate of title thereto.

This contract was assigned by the Embrees to Philip L. Wilson, plaintiff herein, by an indorsement reading as follows:

"Los Angeles, November 15, 1912. We hereby transfer all our right, title, and interest in this contract to Philip L. Wilson."

On October 21, 1913, plaintiff Philip L. Wilson inserted in this assignment the words,

"and he agrees to accept the same," and caused the contract and indorsed assignment to be recorded. The assignee, Wilson, entered into possession of the premises after the assignment, and made payments under the contract. On December 1, 1916, at the time an installment of principal and interest became due, plaintiff Wilson tendered defendant Beazley the full amount of principal and interest under said contract, except the sum of $54.55, which had been paid by defendant for taxes, and demanded the deed and certificate of title to the property. The tender was made about 4 o'clock in the afternoon on a ranch some 14 miles from the town of Santa Ana, and defendant's papers and muniments of title had been left in town with his attorney. Defendant telephoned to the office of his attorney in Santa Ana, but found he was out of town, and so informed plaintiff, stating that it would be necessary for defendant to go to his attorney's office for the required papers. Plaintiff and his attorney thereupon departed, declaring that they "could not run all over the country."

The following day, December 2, 1916, plaintiff served defendant with a written notice of rescission of the contract based upon defendant's alleged refusal to accept and comply with the conditions of the tender of the day before. On December 6 defendant tendered plaintiff a deed to the property and a certificate of title, which had been brought down to date. Plaintiff declined to accept the same, and brought the present suit, wherein he seeks the recovery of the money paid by him under the contract, setting forth a cause of action for rescission and one based upon failure of consideration. Defendant, by cross-complaint, seeks a specific performance of the contract. The trial court decreed that plaintiff recover nothing, and that defendant was entitled to the immediate payment of the total amount of the purchase price remaining unpaid, or $4,726.95, with interest.

[1] Plaintiff directs attention to the fact that the deed and certificate of title were not produced by defendant until five days after plaintiff's tender of the purchase price. It is conceded that defendant had no notice whatever that plaintiff would elect to pay the balance of the purchase price on December 1, 1916, and that defendant had reason to believe that plaintiff did not even intend to pay the installment of principal which fell due on that date. Considering all of the circumstances, it cannot be seriously claimed that defendant's offer of the deed and certificate of title on December 6, 1916, was not a sufficient compliance, in so far as the element of time is concerned, with his contractual obligation to produce a deed and certificate upon the tender of the purchase price. The final installment of the purchase price was not actually due until December, 1918, and defendant was not required to keep a deed and certificate of title in continual readiness prior to that date, in the absence of notice that plaintiff had elected to accelerate the transfer of title. Under the facts of this case an immediate readiness to perform on the part of the vendor could mean no more than an offer and readiness to perform as soon as reasonably possible after notice of plaintiff's election (McVitty v. Flentge, 34 Cal. App. 781, 784, 169 Pac. 666), and there is every indication that there was no unreasonable delay in this respect.

[2] In support of his action to recover the money paid under the contract, plaintiff relies primarily upon two grounds. The first is that defendant was unable to furnish a clear title to the property, for the reason that the certificate of title showed the property to be subject to an existing easement. It appears that in September, 1911, prior to the execution of the contract of sale, defendant Beazley had granted to the Standard Oil Company an easement for a pipe line and for telegraph and telephone lines on a single line of poles. Plaintiff Wilson was not informed of the existence of this easement until December 19, 1913. On the date last mentioned the plaintiff, Wilson, joined in a grant to the Standard Oil Company of an easement for a second pipe line upon the premises, which was, to quote from the grant, "to be laid along and parallel to the pipe lines of grantee now upon said property." And it is further provided in this second grant:

"The rights herein granted are supplemental and in addition to the rights granted in and by certain grant to said Standard Oil Company dated September 28, 1911, and recorded in Book 4694 of Deeds, at page 224, Los Angeles county records."

The mere fact that the assignee, Wilson, continued in possession of the premises after receiving actual knowledge of the existence of the incumbrance created by defendant Beazley did not constitute a waiver of the right of rescission for defective title. This is so for the reason that, where the incumbrance is such that it can, in the nature of things, be removed, no right of rescission exists until the time for performance by the vendor has arrived and the latter has failed to effect the required removal. Latimer v. Capay Valley Land Co., 137 Cal. 286, 70 Pac. 82; Prentice v. Erskine, 164 Cal. 450, 129 Pac. 585. While in such a case the vendee does not waive his right to the removal of an incumbrance by merely continuing in possession after knowledge of its existence, he may, nevertheless, waive this right in other ways before the time for performance by the vendor has arrived. That is to say, he may waive the right by performing acts plainly indicating that he does not contemplate the extinguishment of a particular incumbrance. This the plaintiff, Wilson, has done in the instant case by joining in the grant of the supplemental easement for the consideration of $100 paid to him at the time of the execution of the second grant, without raising any objection to the continued existence of the rights acquired under the first grant. Upon the facts proven the trial court was amply justified in finding:

"That plaintiff, by the entering into the supplemental agreement for the additional pipe line easement, * * * intended to and did waive any and all objections that he might otherwise have had to the original grant of easement."

[3, 4] The second ground relied upon by plaintiff is the damage wrought by four floods, two in the year 1914, and two in January, 1916. The testimony shows, and it is found by the trial court, that, as a result of the floods, a large part of the surface soil on the premises was washed away; a river which formerly did not touch the property in question established a new course through the same, and the premises depreciated in value, but were not completely destroyed. On the other hand, it was found by the court that when plaintiff went into possession of the property he removed therefrom, despite defendant's objection, an apple orchard which produced a crop worth over $1,000 a year, and that he also scraped off and removed to adjoining property considerable surface soil. The court found, and the evidence shows, these acts of the plaintiff reduced the land in value from $8,000 to $4,000.

It is apparent that plaintiff by his own acts placed himself in a position where he was unable to restore to defendant that which he had received under contract. Furthermore, assuming, for the purpose of discussion, and without deciding, that the alleged injuries to the land in suit caused by the floods constituted a cause for rescission, nevertheless the duty devolved upon the plaintiff to effect a rescission, if he were entitled to the same, with promptness. Civ. Code, § 1691, subd. 1. The failure to exercise reasonable diligence in this regard, after notice of the accrual of the right, will defeat the rescission. Ferguson v. Edgar, 178 Cal. 17, 171 Pac. 1061. A considerable interval of time ensued between plaintiff's first knowledge of the destruction caused by the flood and his attempted rescission.

[5] Moreover, plaintiff not only failed to promptly notify defendant that he declined to proceed with the purchase, but, in December, 1916, almost a year after the last flood, elected to tender the balance of the purchase price and demand a conveyance of the property at that time. When plaintiff did serve a notice of rescission on December 2, 1916, it was based solely upon defendant's alleged refusal to accept plaintiff's tender and inability to furnish a clear title to the property. Having affirmed the contract after knowledge of the damage caused by the floods, plaintiff is precluded from claiming a failure of consideration or a right of rescission because of that damage.

[6] This disposes of the contentions in support of plaintiff's action for the recovery of the money paid under the contract, and there remains for consideration defendant's cross-complaint for specific performance of the contract. In this connection plaintiff and cross-defendant, Wilson, calls attention to the decision of the District Court of Appeal of this state in the case of Beazley v. Embree, 41 Cal. App. 706, 183 Pac. 298. This was an action by the present defendant Beazley against the Embrees and the assignee, Wilson, upon the same contract here in controversy for the recovery of the $1,000 installment due December 1, 1915. The court there held, upon appeal by the assignee, Wilson, that there was no privity between the assignee, Wilson, and Beazley, and, therefore, that Beazley had no right to sue Wilson directly for moneys under the contract. Plaintiff Wilson now contends that this decision is the law of the case on this appeal. Tally v. Ganahl, 151 Cal. 418, 90 Pac. 1049. We need not determine whether a decision of the district court of appeal on a former appeal is the law of the case on a subsequent appeal to the Supreme Court, irrespective of the Supreme Court's approval of that decision, for we are of the opinion that the decision in that case is correct, and that no additional facts have been presented in the case at bar to alter the reasoning there applied.

In the case of Lisenby v. Newton, 120 Cal. 571, 52 Pac. 813, 65 Am. St. Rep. 203, it was held that the assignment of the vendee's "right, title, and interest" in a contract for the sale of real property does not render the assignee personally liable to the vendor for payments thereunder, even though the assignee take possession under the contract. In the instant case there was such an assignment. There was no contract directly for the benefit of the vendor, nor was there at any time any privity between the vendor and assignee. The words "and he agrees to accept the same," even if capable of interpretation as an agreement to assume personal liability to the vendor, are without such force in this case. They were added without consideration after the assignment was complete and without the knowledge of either assignor or vendor. The finding of the trial court that plaintiff and cross-defendant Wilson "did insert and cause the said words to be written therein for the purpose of consenting to and assuming the obligations of said contract and giving notice thereof," and that "the said plaintiff assumed the obligations of the said Embrees under said contract," is not supported by the evidence, and therefore need not be further considered.

[7] The performance of acts by the assignee causing depreciation in the value of the property could have no further effect than to render him liable in an action for damages; such acts did not create a contractual relation between the assignee and vendor. Nor was a contractual relation established by the assignee's tender of the purchase price on December 1, 1916. It was held in Lisenby v. Newton, supra, that payments by the assignee of principal and interest on account of the contract price did not give rise to an implication that the assignee had assumed a personal liability to the vendor for the payment of the sums due under the contract. It was stated in that case:

"Of course, no assignee of the purchaser in an executory contract for the sale of real estate can require the vendor to convey unless the purchase money be paid, but this conditional right to a conveyance is quite a different thing from personal liability to compulsory payment at the suit of the vendor; such liability can result only from some express or implied contract of the assignee, and is not implied from the mere assignment of the original contract, although followed by possession of the land."

Section 1589 of the Civil Code, providing that a voluntary acceptance of the benefit of a transaction is equivalent to a consent to all the obligations arising from it, does not alter the rule of the case of Lisenby v. Newton, supra. This section is applicable to an assignee only when all the benefits of a full performance by the vendor have inured to the assignee. Robinson v. Rispin, 33 Cal. App. 536, 541, 165 Pac. 979. It follows that the vendor Beazley cannot hold cross-defendant Wilson personally liable for performance of the contract.

The judgment upon the complaint is affirmed, and the judgment upon the cross-complaint is reversed, with direction to the court below to enter upon the findings made a judgment of strict foreclosure, requiring the payment within a reasonable time to be fixed by the court of the amount found due the defendant, and directing that, in default of such payment, the rights of plaintiff be terminated.

Appeal and error ⊂=411—Notice to clerk to prepare transcript not sufficient notice of appeal.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 941b, relative to notice of appeal, and section 953a, providing that any person desiring to appeal may file with the clerk a notice stating that he desires to appeal, or has appealed, and requesting a transcript to be prepared, a notice entitled "Notice of Appeal and Request for Transcript under section 953a, C. C. P.," and stating that plaintiff "has appealed," and requesting the clerk to prepare a transcript, is not a sufficient notice of appeal; there being nothing to show that plaintiff is thereby taking an appeal.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; Hugh H. Craig, Judge.

Action by Sarah J. Wall against J. George Hunter and others. From a judgment dismissing the action, plaintiff appeals. On motion to dismiss the appeal. Appeal dismissed.

D. B. Chaplin, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

A. Aird Adair, of Riverside, for respondents.

LAWLOR, J. This is an appeal from a judgment against plaintiff, Sarah J. Wall, and in favor of the defendants, dismissing the action because of the failure of plaintiff to file an undertaking securing the payment of costs, as required by section 1036 of the Code of Civil Procedure. The action was for damages in the sum of $100,000 for the alienation of the affections of plaintiff's husband, Thomas D. Wall. Service of summons was only made on the defendants J. George Hunter and A. H. Winder, although one John J. Wall was a party defendant. The complaint was filed on August 19, 1919. A general demurrer was interposed on behalf of Hunter and Winder. On September 29, 1919, an amended demurrer was filed. On the same day Hunter and Winder, in their own proper persons, filed the demand for security for costs, whereupon the court declined to hear the demurrer. Plaintiff then moved to strike the demand from the files. Before this motion was heard, Hunter and Winder, by their attorney filed a second demand for security for costs. The motion to strike the first demand from the files was denied, and later, upon motion of Hunter and Winder, the action was dismissed, and judgment entered as heretofore stated. Following this, plaintiff filed a purported notice of appeal in these words:

"[Title of Court and Cause] Notice of Appeal and Request for Transcript under Section 953a, C. C. P. To Honorable D. G. Clayton, Clerk of said Court—Sir: You will please take notice that the plaintiff in the above-entitled action has appealed to the Supreme Court of the state of California from the order entered by said court on the 10th day of November, 1919, dismissing the above-entitled action, and does hereby request that a transcript * * * be made up and prepared in compliance with section 953a of Code of Civil Procedure."

Respondents appeared specially before this court to move to dismiss such appeal. This motion was heard and denied, without prejudice, however, "to renewal at hearing of cause on merits." The motion was thereafter renewed, and respondent now contends that the said notice of appeal is not sufficient, in that it does not indicate an intention to thereby appeal, within the meaning of section 941b, Code of Civil Procedure. The language of this section is that the appellant "does thereby appeal." The notice here states that appellant "has appealed."

We have considered a number of cases wherein the notice under section 953a was relied on to constitute the appeal. It was said in Boling v. Alton, 162 Cal. 297, 122 Pac. 461:

"Section 953a merely provides a substitute for a bill of exceptions. It does not purport to authorize an appeal, or prescribe how it may be taken. The language of this notice is a literal compliance with this section. It does not comply with the provisions of section 940 or 941b, prescribing the method of taking an appeal. It states, in effect, that an appeal had been * * * taken, which was not true. * * * We do not think that a notice which is a literal and proper compliance with section 953a, and which merely initiates the statutory proceeding there prescribed for making up the record, should be turned by construction into a notice of appeal, and held to be good as such, under a section with which it does not comply."

In Marcucci v. Vowinckel, 164 Cal. 693, 130 Pac. 430, it was held:

"Because of the frequent misunderstanding of the effect of this section [953a] we repeat that it does not provide for a notice of appeal, and that a notice given under it, in the form there prescribed and without other appropriate words, is not a good notice of appeal. Smith v. Jaccard, 20 Cal. App. 280, 128 Pac. 1026; Boling v. Alton, 162 Cal. 298, 122 Pac. 461; Lent v. California F. G. Ass'n, 161 Cal. 719, 121 Pac. 1002. Counsel for respondent do not raise the objection, and we therefore assume that a proper notice of appeal was filed, and that its insertion in the record was waived."

In Estate of Faber, 168 Cal. 491, 143 Pac. 737, it was declared:

"The opening part of the notice of appeal shows the defect relied on. It is as follows: 'Notice is hereby given, pursuant to section 953a of the Code of Civil Procedure, to all persons concerned that the undersigned, Mary E. Suffal, desires to appeal, and does hereby appeal, to the Supreme Court from the order,' etc. We deem this a sufficient notice in substance, although it is not in good form. It differs from the notices of appeal held insufficient in Lent v. California, etc., Ass'n, 161 Cal. 719, 121 Pac. 1002, Boling v. Alton, 162 Cal. 299, 122 Pac. 461, and Marcucci v. Vowinckel, 164 Cal. 695, 130 Pac. 430, in this: that it expressly states that Mary E. Suffal 'does hereby appeal,' from the order, etc. * * * The notices in the cases cited did not contain any equivalent language, but were plainly phrased for notices to the clerk to prepare the transcript, as provided by section 953a. This notice expressly states that the petitioner does appeal, and it is therefore good as a notice of appeal under section 941b of the Code of Civil Procedure. The fact that it is drawn to serve the double office * * * does not destroy its effect as a notice of appeal."

These cases are decisive of the question of the validity of this appeal. No notice was filed under section 941b, and the notice here contains no language which could serve as the equivalent of a notice that the appellant was thereby taking an appeal.

It is unnecessary, therefore, to consider the merits of the purported appeal.

The appeal is dismissed.

HARRIS v. CLAYTON. (S. F. 8926.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 7, 1921. Rehearing Denied Aug. 4, 1921.)

1. Principal and agent ⟸23(1) — Evidence held to prove that plaintiff's assignor sold goods to defendant on his own account, and not as agent.

In action for goods sold and delivered, in which defendant claimed that plaintiff's assignor in the sale of the goods to defendant acted merely as the agent of a third party, and therefore was not a proper party in interest, evidence held to prove that the assignor sold the goods on his own account, and not as agent for a third party.

2. Principal and agent ⟸25(3)—Agent's assignee estopped from claiming that agent sold defendant goods on his own account only if fraud or disadvantage or damage to defendant is shown.

Where a salesman employed to represent a firm in certain territory introduced himself to a buyer as the representative of such firm, corresponded with such buyer on the firm's stationery, and made invoices and rendered statements upon the firm's billheads, the salesman's assignee in action against the buyer for goods sold and delivered would have been estopped from claiming that the goods were sold to buyer by the salesman on his own account, if any fraud upon the buyer or disadvantage or damage to her were shown, but was not estopped from claiming that the salesman was carrying the claim against the buyer on his own account or at least in his own name as a trustee for the firm in the absence of such a showing.

3. Parties ⟸7(2)—Salesman who sold goods on his own account could bring action against buyer.

Where a salesman who represented a firm in certain territory introduced himself to a buyer as the representative of such firm, corresponded with the buyer on the firm's stationery, and made invoices and rendered statements upon the firm's billheads, but where the salesman kept the account in his own name and was permitted by the firm to do a business on his own account, and where in fact the firm had no account with such buyer, the salesman's assignee could maintain an action for the sale and delivery of the goods, either on the theory that the salesman was the real party in interest, or, if an agent, was acting with authority to carry and collect the account in his own name, and thereby became a trustee of an express trust within Code Civ. Proc. §§ 367, 369, permitting such a trustee to sue in his own name.

4. Limitation of actions ⊂⊃146(3)—Debtor's request to have payments applied against an old indebtedness held a promise to pay indebtedness on which creditor might have brought suit.

Retailer's letter to wholesaler requesting wholesaler to apply monthly cash payments against an old account instead of applying them toward payment of goods being furnished on a new account held an admission of the indebtedness on the old account and a promise to pay it that might have been sued upon as a new promise in writing.

5. Limitation of actions ⊂⊃148(4)—Letter requesting creditor to apply current payments to old account held to toll statute as to old account.

Debtor's letter to creditor requesting that the monthly cash payments being made by debtor be credited on an old account instead of being applied to a current account for goods being furnished held to toll the statute of limitations as to the old account.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action by M. H. Harris against Nellie Clayton, also known as Nellie A. Clayton, also known as N. A. Clayton, also known as Mrs. E. O. Clayton. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Arnold C. Lackenbach and Lionel D. Hargis, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Brantley W. Dobbins and H. M. Anthony, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

SLOANE, J. The plaintiff brought this action as the assignee of one W. J. Conroy to recover a balance on account for goods sold and delivered from San Francisco to the defendant in Manila, P. I.

The account covered a period of several years and the total sales amounted to many thousands of dollars upon which payments were made from time to time.

It is claimed by plaintiff that the account was carried for the entire period as an open running mutual account. The items sued for constitute an alleged balance for goods sold and delivered between the 1st day of November, 1913, and the 1st day of August, 1914, in the sum of $3,715.37.

The same amount is also sued for in a separate cause of action on account stated, but this count was not pressed, no evidence being offered in its support.

The defendant interposed two defenses. First, that the suit was not brought in behalf of or in the name of the real party in interest; and, second, that the balance owing on the account, the amount of which was not disputed, was for goods purchased prior to March 17, 1913, and thereafter was stated by oral agreement between the parties in July, 1914, and that any claim therefor, whether on the open account or as a stated account, was barred by the statute of limitations. The complaint was filed March 7, 1917.

The findings material to the issues here presented are as follows:

"Second. That on or about the month of March, 1911, W. J. Conroy, who was then, and ever since has been, in the employ of Muller & Raas, wholesale milliners, engaged in the business of wholesale millinery in the said city and county of San Francisco, acting for and on behalf of Muller & Raas, entered into an oral agreement with the defendant whereby the defendant agreed to purchase on open book account, and the said W. J. Conroy, acting for and on behalf of Muller & Raas, agreed to sell to the defendant on open book account at Manila, Philippine Islands, millinery goods, and thereafter and commencing in the month of March, 1911, said goods were so sold and delivered to defendant at Manila, and that from time to time additional goods were sold, as aforesaid, on open book account, up to the 26th day of December, 1912; thereafter defendant purchased millinery goods from said W. J. Conroy, acting for and on behalf of Muller & Raas, through Peabody & Co., of Manila, Philippine Islands, and San Francisco, paying for said millinery goods cash at San Francisco, and that said cash transactions continued up to the 15th day of October, 1913, at which time the defendant assigned the millinery business which she then maintained at Manila, Philippine Islands, to Peabody & Co.

"Third. That the defendant between the month of March, 1911, and the 26th day of December, 1912, purchased through W. J. Conroy, who was then and ever since has been in the employ of Muller & Raas, wholesale milliners engaged in the business of wholesale millinery in said city and county of San Francisco, acting for and on behalf of said Muller & Raas, and entered into an oral agreement with said W. J. Conroy whereby the defendant agreed to purchase on open book account at Manila, Philippine Islands, millinery goods, and thereafter and commencing in the month of March, 1911, said goods were so sold and delivered to the defendant at Manila, and that from time to time thereafter additional goods were sold as aforesaid, on open book account, up to the 26th day of December, 1912; that on the 1st day of July, 1914, the said account was stated and upon such statement a balance of $3,715.37 was found to be due against the defendant, in favor of said W. J. Conroy, acting as aforesaid, in favor of said Muller & Raas."

As conclusions of law the court finds that the plaintiff is not the real party in interest, and that the claim sued on is barred.

[1] We agree with appellant that the evidence does not support the finding that Conroy, plaintiff's assignor, was not a proper party in interest. It is true, as contended by respondent, that Conroy introduced himself to her as the representative of the San Francisco millinery firm of Muller & Raas, and his subsequent dealings with her were calculated to assure her and doubtless did lead her to the conclusion that she was dealing with the firm of Muller & Raas through Conroy as its agent. A conversation which respondent testified to between herself and a member of the firm of Muller & Raas in effect confirmed this belief. The correspondence between Conroy and respondent was mostly on the firm stationery, and the invoices and statements were rendered upon the firm billheads.

[2] This evidence would be ample to estop the plaintiff from disputing the fact, as found, if any fraud upon respondent or disadvantage or damage to her were shown. But no elements of estoppel enter into the case. Respondent makes no claim that she suffers disadvantage by permitting it to be shown that Conroy was carrying this claim on his own account, or at least in his own name as a trustee for his firm.

That this was actually the case there can be no question under the evidence. Conroy testifies that while he was the traveling salesman of Muller & Raas within certain territory he was also doing business on his own account in the Orient with the consent of his employers, and that this was one of the accounts carried in his own name. The only entry of account in this transaction was shown to have been one kept by himself; and one of the members of the firm of Muller & Raas and secretary of the company testified that he was familiar with the accounts of the firm, and that they had never sold Mrs. Clayton any goods and never rendered her any account or demand, and that Conroy was privileged to and did carry accounts for himself in the Orient and in Australia. No attempt was made to show that any account with Mrs. Clayton appeared upon the firm books. The witness testified that, while he had not examined the books to verify his statement, he was positive there was no such account.

Mrs. Clayton testifies to a conversation which she had on one of her visits to San Francisco with a member of the firm, one of the Raas brothers, which, like her dealings with Conroy, would justify her belief that the firm was carrying the account. She says:

"He also told me that he found from long experience that it was best to have one representative, one territory, and that all my negotiations should therefore be addressed to Mr. Conroy, and all the banking business, all the customhouse business, all the cable codes, invoices, bills, etc., should be attended to by Mr. Conroy, as the Eastern representative of the firm of Muller & Raas."

At the same time this representation by a member of the firm authorized respondent to look to and deal with Conroy exclusively, and on the strength of this authorization she admits having carried on all her correspondence and made all of her remittances directly and personally to Conroy. In her answer defendant pleads that an oral account was stated on or about the 15th of August, 1914, "between said W. J. Conroy and the defendant," and that upon such statement "a balance of $3,715.37 was found due to the said W. J. Conroy from said defendant."

[3] We are satisfied under this state of the evidence that the plaintiff could maintain this action as the assignee of Conroy either on the theory that he was the real party in interest, or, if an agent, was acting with authority to carry and collect the account in his own name, and thereby became a trustee of an express trust within the meaning of section 369, Code of Civil Procedure.

Section 367 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which requires that every action must be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest, makes an exception as provided in section 369 of the same Code to the effect that a trustee of an express trust may sue without joining with him the persons for whose benefit the action is prosecuted, and declares that—

"A person with whom, or in whose name, a contract is made for the benefit of another, is a trustee of an express trust, within the meaning of this section."

In Mechem on Agency (2d Ed.) § 2028, it is said:

"The agent's right to sue in these cases (where a third person has dealt with an agent) is not usually defeated by the statutory provisions found in many of the states that actions shall be brought in the name of the real party in interest, since these statutes either contain express exceptions, or, under the right of a trustee of an express trust to sue, provide such comprehensive definitions of such a trustee as to include an agent who has made a contract for his principal."

In Tandy v. Waesch, 154 Cal. 108, 97 Pac. 69, the plaintiff had entered into a contract for the purchase of land in his own name, but for the benefit of a third party. In an action under this contract he was held a proper party plaintiff. This court in the opinion in the case cited thus states the rule as provided in sections 337 and 339, Code, of Civil Procedure:

"Tandy, however, was a proper party plaintiff. To the general rule laid down in section 367 of the Code of Civil Procedure that every action must be prosecuted in the name of the real party in interest, there are certain exceptions specified in section 369 of the Code of Civil Procedure. That section authorizes the trustee of an express trust to sue without joining the beneficiary and declares that a person with whom or in whose name a contract is made for the benefit of another is a trustee of an express trust within the meaning of this section. The contract having been made in Tandy's name for the benefit of Garland, Tandy thus became the trustee of an express trust and entitled to maintain the action."

See Walker v. McCusker, 71 Cal. 594, 12 Pac. 723; Giselman v. Starr, 106 Cal. 657, 40 Pac. 8; Los Robles Water Co. v. Stoneman, 146 Cal. 204, 79 Pac. 880; Anglo-Californian Bank v. Cerf, 147 Cal. 384, 81 Pac. 1077; Pomeroy's Code Remedies, §§ 103, 105; Bliss on Code Pleadings, § 57.

Appellant makes objection to the sufficiency of the findings on this point.

Referring again to the findings quoted, it will be observed that there is no direct finding that defendant did not become indebted to W. J. Conroy in the sum of $3,715.37 between the 1st day of November, 1913, and the 1st day of August, 1914, on an open book account, as alleged in the complaint.

The finding upon which this issue for defendant rests is only to the effect that up to the 26th day of December, 1912, goods were sold to defendant by W. J. Conroy, acting for Muller & Raas, and that thereafter within the dates alleged by the complaint "defendant purchased millinery goods from W. J. Conroy, acting for and on behalf of Muller & Raas, through Peabody & Co., of Manila, Philippine Islands, and San Francisco, paying for the millinery goods cash at San Francisco."

It does not affirmatively appear that the account covered by the findings was the same as that declared upon in the action. While, however, appellant disputes the sufficiency of this finding to support the judgment, no question is made that there was any other transaction had between the defendant and either Muller & Raas or Conroy than the one referred to in the findings, and it may be held to sufficiently refer to the account in suit.

As to the contention of appellant that this finding as to the payment for all goods delivered between the dates named is not supported by the evidence, we cannot so hold, unless upon grounds later to be discussed. There is evidence to the effect that during the period covered by the items of account sued for Mrs. Clayton did no business personally with Conroy or his firm; that under some arrangement with Peabody & Co. that firm purchased and advanced the money for all the goods bought through Conroy for Mrs. Clayton. This is borne out by the itemized account of Conroy which shows charges for goods at various dates within the period mentioned, and in each instance a corresponding credit by cash of the exact amount of each separate charge, by Peabody & Co. within 30 days after delivery of the goods. Peabody's representative testified that his firm ordered the goods on advices from Manila, received them and forwarded them to the Clayton establishment in Manila, and paid for them with the Peabody & Co. check. All but two of the charges covered by the complaint so appear, and Mrs. Clayton testified that she did not order or receive the goods comprising these.

It is a fair conclusion from the evidence thus far referred to that as found by the court the old account was closed prior to December 26, 1912, with a balance then due from defendant of some $4,851.86. In her subsequent correspondence with Conroy this was referred to by Mrs. Clayton as "the old account."

There is sufficient support in the evidence under this state of facts to uphold the finding of the court that the subsequent purchases had been paid for, and that the old account was barred by the statute of limitations.

The true state of the case with reference to the claim actually sued on would be that it had been paid rather than that it was barred.

It, however, further appears from the record that Conroy had carried this account on his books throughout as an open running account; that the goods sold were charged to Mrs. Clayton and the various payments credited on account, with nothing to show that the Peabody payments were applied to the later charges as they accrued other than the facts that they were shown to have been paid by Peabody & Co. and that the separate amounts corresponded with the separate items charged.

As between Peabody & Co. and the plaintiff, the latter would be clearly estopped from an application of these payments to the old account of Mrs. Clayton, but the relation of Mrs. Clayton to this matter is different.

[4, 5] It appears from her own letters that Conroy was pressing her for settlement of the old account, and that she requested him to credit the Peabody payments thereon in order to keep the account alive. On December 27, 1913, she writes:

"I shall try to send you one hundred dollars each month to apply to the old account."

In a letter dated June 15, 1913, she says:

"Your cable of last Monday received. In view of the fact that I have asked you to let the monthly cash payments be applied against the old account, and have fully explained to you the inadvisability of my sending you anything until after the first of the year, I do not quite understand your cable."

And further in the same letter:

"It has not been a path strewn with roses, but if you will kindly apply the monthly cash payments against the old account and do not let Peabody & Co. into your confidence, I do see how the business will work itself out to a satisfactory end to all concerned. * * * I would prefer to throw it up sooner than worry, so I repeat I desire that you credit the monthly cash payments against my old account, which will leave me owing you on a current account."

There is an admission here of the indebtedness and a promise to pay the same that might have been sued upon as a new promise in writing, but in any event the direction to credit these subsequent payments on the old account, with the express purpose of preserving the rights of plaintiff's assignor on an open current account for the goods subsequently purchased, in our judgment establishes plaintiff's right to maintain this action and prevents the bar of the statute of limitations. That the amount sued for is owing and unpaid is not disputed.

The judgment is reversed.

GROSS v. BURNSIDE. (L. A. 6412.)

1. Municipal corporations ⊜706(5)—Court held justified in finding 15 miles an hour an excessive speed.

Though 15 miles an hour was a legal rate of speed for an automobile at a street intersection, where the night was dark, the place insufficiently lighted, the street slippery, and the view obstructed by a street car turning into the street from an intersecting street, the court was justified in finding that such speed was excessive, negligent, and careless.

2. Municipal corporations ⊜706(5)—Evidence held to support finding that automobile driver did not sound horn.

In an action for injuries to a person struck by an automobile, the testimony of plaintiff and her companion that they did not hear the horn supported a finding that defendant failed to sound the horn, where he and his companion gave no testimony on the subject.

3. Municipal corporations ⊜706(6)—Whether sounding of automobile horn was necessary held question for trial court, sitting without jury.

Where the night was dark, the place insufficiently lighted, the street slippery, and the view obstructed by a street car, and an automobile was driving 15 miles an hour at a street intersection, and the driver saw a pedestrian crossing the street before she stooped down to pick up an article, it was a question for the trial court, sitting without a jury, whether it was necessary for the driver to sound his horn, within the Motor Vehicle Act, requiring the horn to be sounded whenever necessary.

4. Municipal corporations ⊜706(5) — Evidence held to support finding that automobile driver negligently failed to use brakes.

In an action for injuries to a person struck by an automobile, evidence held to support a finding that the automobile driver negligently failed to use his brakes to stop the automobile.

5. Municipal corporations ⊜706(9)—Finding that automobile driver failed to have proper equipment held sufficiently specific.

Where, in an action for injuries to a person struck by an automobile, which skidded when the driver turned to avoid striking her, there was evidence that there were no chains on the rear wheels, a finding that defendant failed to have proper equipment on the automobile was sufficiently specific.

6. Municipal corporations ⊜706(5)—Conflicting evidence as to chains held to support finding that motorist did not have proper equipment.

In an action for injuries to a person struck by a skidding automobile, conflicting evidence as to whether there were chains on the rear wheels justified a finding that defendant's automobile was without proper equipment.

7. Municipal corporations ⊜706(5)—Evidence held to support finding that person struck by automobile was not negligent.

In an action for injuries to a person, crossing a street diagonally, and struck by an automobile when at a place not a street crossing, while stooping to pick up an article, evidence held to support finding that no carelessness, recklessness, or negligence of plaintiff contributed to the injury.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Paul J. McCormick, Judge.

Action by Isabell Gross against I. M. Burnside. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Scarborough & Bowen, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Joseph Scott and A. G. Ritter, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LAWLOR, J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment for the plaintiff in an action for damages for injuries alleged to have been sustained by the plaintiff as a result of her being run down by defendant's automobile while it was driven by him. The case was tried by the court sitting without a jury.

The evidence shows that the accident occurred on the 13th day of November, 1919, at about 9 p. m., near the intersection of Sunset boulevard and Echo Park avenue, in the city of Los Angeles. The night was dark and the corner was poorly lighted by an arc light. It had been raining and drizzling earlier in the day, and the street was wet and slippery. On Sunset boulevard the car tracks are double, and on Echo Park avenue single. The Echo Park avenue tracks turn the corner toward the east and join the northern tracks on Sunset boulevard. At the time in question a car of the Echo Park avenue line had run out across Sunset boulevard so far that the front of the car had crossed the northern track of the boulevard. Occupying this position, the car completely obstructed the north side of the boulevard, from the car tracks to the curb, making it necessary for one traveling west on the boulevard to turn out into the middle of the street to clear the southern end of the car. Just before the accident occurred respondent and one Mrs. Mary Jackman started across the boulevard from the northwest to the southwest corner of the intersection with Echo Park avenue. Mrs. Jackman walked straight across, and respondent went diagonally to the right. While crossing, respondent looked up and down the street to see if there were any danger from traffic; but her view to the east was obstructed by the Echo Park avenue car extending out across the northern side of the boulevard. Mrs. Jackman continued on across the street. When about half way across respondent stopped, and, facing west, stooped over to pick up an article from the street.

About this time appellant, accompanied by one Harry Furlott, was driving his machine west on the north side of Sunset boulevard. He turned out to go around the left or southern end of the Echo Park avenue car. The court found that at this point the machine was traveling at the rate of about 15 miles an hour. According to appellant's testimony, after he passed the street car he saw respondent, who had not yet stopped; that he judged she had ample time to cross in front of the automobile; that he assumed she would continue across the street; and that for this reason he did not sound his horn. It was at this time respondent stopped and stooped over. Mrs. Jackman, who had arrived at the south curb, screamed, "Belle, look out for the machine!" Appellant put on his brakes. The automobile skidded and turned almost completely around: the rear wheels describing an arc to the right. Respondent was struck, receiving the injuries complained of. She testified she did not at any time see the automobile and that Mrs. Jackman's warning was the first she knew of its approach.

The first point urged by appellant for reversal is thus stated:

"I. The evidence shows that the defendant was operating his auto at the time of the accident in a careful manner, and that he committed no act of negligence which proximately caused the plaintiff's injuries."

The court found appellant to have been negligent in these particulars: (1) That he drove his machine around the end of the street car at an excessive rate of speed, to wit, about 15 miles an hour. (2) That he failed to give any warning. (3) That he failed to use his brakes after he passed the street car, and that he failed to have proper equipment on the automobile.

[1] Appellant contends there was no negligence on his part, because 15 miles per hour is the lawful rate of speed at such intersections, and nothing in the circumstances of this case made it unlawful. While this is the legal rate of speed, yet it cannot be held that under the circumstances shown the court was not justified in finding that appellant—

"negligently and carelessly drove said automobile at said intersection on the left-hand or southerly side of said Pacific Electric car, then standing on Echo Park avenue car track, at an excessive rate of speed, to wit, about fifteen miles per hour."

The evidence was uncontradicted that the night was dark, the place was insufficiently lighted, the street was slippery, and the street car obstructed the view. While, under other circumstances, 15 miles an hour might not be an excessive rate of speed, it may well have been excessive in this particular situation. Appellant testified he was driving carefully, and had slowed down when he came to the street car; but it was for the trial court to determine whether he was driving carefully and at a proper rate of speed under the circumstances.

[2, 3] The court also found:

"* * * That said defendant negligently and carelessly failed to sound the horn, or give any signal or warning whatever, by which plaintiff might be warned of the near approach of said defendant's automobile. That after said defendant passed said Pacific Electric car he negligently and carelessly failed to notice said plaintiff, or to use the brakes of his automobile for stopping said automobile, and also failed to have proper equipment of said automobile at said time, but, on the contrary, negligently and recklessly ran said automobile against said plaintiff, and that the negligence of said defendant was the proximate and direct cause of the accident."

Respondent and Mrs. Jackman testified they did not hear the horn, and neither appellant nor Furlott gave any testimony on the subject. Therefore the finding that appellant failed to sound the horn must be sustained. Appellant relies, however, on the provisions of the Motor Vehicle Act (St. 1915, p. 405) that "every auto must be equipped with a horn and the person operating it shall sound the horn whenever necessary as a warning of danger but not at any other time nor for any other purpose," and insists it was not necessary to blow the horn in this instance. The statute provided the horn should be sounded "whenever necessary." Appellant testified his headlights were burning brightly; that he saw respondent as soon as he passed the street car, while she was still walking across the street and before she stooped down. Keeping in view, also, the condition of the night, there was evidence from which it could be determined whether it was or was not necessary to sound the horn, and the court impliedly found the necessity existed.

[4] Appellant also insists there was no negligence in the use of the brake. He testified on this subject to the effect that he was driving carefully around the street car; that about a third of a block away he saw respondent; that—

"When you see people crossing the street, you figure on them going across, but here she stopped and stooped over facing west. At that time I jammed on the brakes and tried to turn to the side."

On cross-examination he testified:

"Q. Did you put on the brake when you first saw her? A. No, sir; not until I saw her stoop over. Q. Not until you saw her stoop over? A. No, sir; there was no need. Q. Answer the question yes or no. A. I don't know that I did —I did not. I had one foot on the clutch and one on the brake. As near as I can remember I did not put on the brake until I saw that we were going to run into her."

The finding, as we have seen, was that he negligently failed to use the brakes. Appellant admitted he did not put on the brakes until he saw respondent stoop over, and that he "jammed on" the brakes, causing the car to skid. Since he carelessly failed to sound the horn, the court might have concluded that there was all the more reason for using the brakes sooner than he did, and hence it cannot be said that the finding is not supported by the evidence.

[5, 6] Appellant objects to the finding that he failed to have proper equipment, for the reasons that it is not specified what equipment was omitted, and that his testimony showed the automobile was equipped with headlights, chains on the rear wheels and with a brake. He also asserts opposing witnesses merely testified they did not see any chains on the wheels either at the place of the accident or at the hospital, and that there was no testimony that the absence of chains caused the skidding. However, Mrs. Jackman and Harry A. Davis, the conductor on the street car, testified positively there were not chains on the rear wheels. We are of the opinion that the finding was sufficiently specific. As to the evidence, there is a direct conflict as to whether there were chains on the rear wheels; it is not claimed there were any on the front wheels. Considering all the evidence on this point, it was sufficient to justify the finding that appellant "failed to have proper equipment of said automobile at said time."

[7] Appellant next urges that:

"II. The plaintiff herself was negligent, and her negligence contributed to the accident, and was the proximate cause of the accident, and of her injuries resulting therefrom."

This contention is based on the conduct of respondent in stopping in the middle of a heavily traveled street without any light, in being at a place which was not a street crossing, where pedestrians would not be expected to be and in failing to keep a lookout for traffic. The court found:

"That it is not true that any carelessness or negligence or recklessness of plaintiff contributed to the damage which said plaintiff sustained by reason of said collision," or that the "injuries suffered by plaintiff were directly or proximately caused by the negligence or carelessness or recklessness of the said plaintiff herself."

Respondent testified that before leaving the curb she looked up and down the street, that she looked again when she got to the car track, and that before stooping over to pick up the article she looked both ways, but failed to see the machine, because the Echo Park avenue car obstructed her view. She testified:

"I had just stooped over, picking up the article, when Mrs. Jackman yelled, 'Look out for the car!' and the car swerved around the end of the street car."

The conductor estimated the distance from the end of the street car to the point where respondent was struck at from 60 to 70 feet. We cannot say from this evidence, considered with the other evidence in the case, that the findings on this subject are without support, or that as a matter of law respondent, by want of ordinary care, brought the injury upon herself.

The parties have cited a number of authorities, but it would serve no purpose to discuss them, for the reasons that there is no question as to the law involved, and that on their facts they would not aid us in determining whether appellant acted negligently, or respondent contributed to her injuries.

Judgment affirmed.

In re RITZMAN'S ESTATE. (L. A. 6733.)

1. Wills ⟸440—Testator's intent must govern.

The intention of the testator expressed in his will shall prevail, provided it is consistent with the rules of law; and, while statutory rules of interpretation are to be followed in so far as they aid in determining the testator's intention, they are all subject to such intention as shown by the will.

2. Wills ⟸629 — Dispositions presumed to vest at testator's death.

It is a rule of interpretation that testamentary dispositions are presumed to vest at the testator's death, although such rule will not prevail if an intention to the contrary clearly appears in the will.

3. Wills ⟸634(1) — Gifts to children after life estate in widow held to vest at testator's death.

Where a will gave the widow all income and as much principal as necessary for her support during her life, and further provided that "Upon the death of my wife I give, devise and bequest" all property to the children in equal parts, held that such language showed an intent to presently vest in such children all property that at the death of the wife should not have been used for her support, and such gift was not postponed to the time of the death of the wife, which marked the commencement of the enjoyment of the property given.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; James C. Rives, Judge.

In the matter of the estate of George W. Ritzman, deceased. Eva E. Bike, an heir at law, appeals from a decree of partial distribution. Affirmed.

G. A. Gibbs and Elliot Gibbs, both of Pasadena, for appellant.

Lloyd W. Brooke, of Pasadena (F. G. Cruikshank, of Pasadena, of counsel), for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. This is an appeal by Eva E. Bike, one of the children of deceased, from a decree of partial distribution. The deceased died testate October 23, 1913. By his will, dated June 25, 1912, he declared that he had a wife, naming her, and six children, naming them. After directing payment of his debts and funeral expenses, he provided for his wife as follows:

"Third. I hereby give, devise and bequeath to my wife Sarah Ritzman all of the income and so much of the principal as may be necessary for her comfortable living and support so long as she lives, and my executors hereinafter named are directed to pay to her monthly sufficient funds for her living and support so long as she lives, and my executors hereinafter named are appointed trustees to hold and manage all of my property for the purpose of carrying out said trust, if any surplus over her living it shall be added to my estate.

"Fourth. Upon the death of my wife Sarah Ritzman I give, devise and bequest and all the rest, residue and remainder of my property as follows: To be in six equal parts. One-sixth (⅙) thereof to my daughter Mary Auman, one-sixth (⅙) thereof to my daughter Eva E. Bike, one-sixth (⅙) thereof to my daughter Maggie Hoff, one-sixth (⅙) thereof to my daughter Lucy Matter, one-sixth (⅙) thereof to my daughter Cora Heiss, and the remaining one-sixth (⅙) thereof to my son William J. Ritzman."

By the fifth paragraph he directed his executors to permit any heir indebted to him to continue owing the estate as long as the wife lives, keeping the interest paid, and on the death of the wife "to take such indebtedness out of the share due to such child." The remaining provisions are not of importance here.

Lucy Matter, one of the six children, died November 1, 1919, one day before the death of Sarah Ritzman, the surviving wife of deceased, who died November 2, 1919. On application for partial distribution the question of the effect of the death of Lucy Matter after the death of deceased and prior to the death of Sarah Ritzman, the wife, was presented. It was held by the trial court that under the terms of the will Lucy Matter upon the death of the testator was at once vested with ownership of one-sixth of the property of the estate subject to administration and the disposition in favor of the wife for her life, and distribution of her share to the administrator of the estate of said Lucy Matter was made on this theory. The theory of appellant is that by the terms of the will, the gift to each child was contingent upon such child surviving the wife, with the result that the gift to Lucy Matter lapsed upon her death prior to the death of the wife.

[1, 2] Appellant's counsel quite correctly claim, quoting Chief Justice Marshall in Smith v. Bell, 6 Pet. 68, 8 L. Ed. 322, that—

"The first and great rule in the exposition of wills, to which all other rules must bend, is, that the intention of the testator, expressed in his will, shall prevail, provided it be consistent with the rules of law."

That this is the well-settled law in this state, both by express statutory provision (section 1317 et seq., Civil Code), and under our decisions, must, of course, be admitted. As we said in Estate of Wilson, 193 Pac. 581:

"Statutory rules of interpretation are to be followed in so far as they aid in determining the intention of the testator, but they are all subject to the fundamental rule that the intention as shown by the will must prevail."

So that while we have a rule of interpretation of wills that testamentary dispositions "are presumed to vest at the testator's death," this rule would not prevail here if "an intention to the contrary clearly" appeared in the will before us. But to our minds the intention of the testator as expressed in his will is in full accord with the presumption declared by this rule.

[3] It seems to us that the language used clearly shows the desire of the testator to presently vest in his six children, share and share alike, all of his property that at the death of his wife shall not have been used "for her comfortable living and support." The gift to the wife is limited to "all of the income and so much of the principal as may be necessary for her comfortable living and support so long as she lives," the executors being directed to pay to her monthly so long as she lives sufficient funds for such living and support, and as trustees for that purpose to hold and manage all of the property. "All the rest, residue and remainder" of his property he gives, devises and bequeaths in equal one-sixth parts to his six children, specifically naming each one as the recipient of a one-sixth part. There is absolutely nothing in the will upon which to found a suggestion that this gift to the children, as distinguished from the possession and enjoyment of the property given, was to be postponed to the time of the death of the wife, except the words preceding the words of disposition, viz.: "Upon the death of my wife Sarah Ritzman I give," etc. But these words, coming immediately after the limited disposition to the wife for "so long as she lives," and used in connection with the gift of the remainder, clearly appear to us to have been used simply as defining the time of commencement of the enjoyment of the property given. Such words so used are usually taken as in no way indicative of an intent to postpone the vesting in right, and as relating "to the time of taking effect in possession and not to the time of taking effect in interest." Norton v. Mortensen, 88 Conn. 28, 36, 89 Atl. 882, 885. See, also, Lingo v. Smith, 174 Iowa, 461, 468, 156 N. W. 402. We have also in this will the division of the residue into six equal parts, and the separate specific absolute gift of a one-sixth part to each of the six children, by name, without any words indicative of the idea of a possible lapse of the disposition as to any child. We have further the provision as to any debt due deceased from any heir, allowing the indebtedness to continue during the life of the wife, such indebtedness to be taken upon the death of the wife "out of the share due to such child," clearly implying the idea in the testator's mind of the certain existence at that time of a one-sixth share in the residue due to the child so indebted to him, from which the indebtedness can surely be paid.

As is apparent from what we have said, we are of opinion that the conclusion of the learned judge of the trial court is correct.

The decree is affirmed.

IVANCICH v. DAVIES. (L. A. 6413.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 26, 1921.)

1. Carriers ⇐238—Person boarding jitney bus while in motion and riding on step without actual knowledge of operator and without paying fare held a passenger.

One boarding a jitney bus as it was leaving a stopping place was no less a passenger because he got aboard while it was in motion, had not paid his fare, and rode on the running board, and the operator had no actual knowledge of his presence, where it was the custom to collect the fare at the end of the journey, and he had money for the fare, and was ready and willing to pay, knowledge of his presence being implied.

2. Carriers ⇐238—By boarding bus person sufficiently indicates intention to become passenger.

Where one boarded a jitney bus with the implied knowledge of the operator of the bus, this was a sufficient indication of his intention to become a passenger.

3. Carriers ⇐331(5)—Riding on running board of crowded jitney bus not negligence as matter of law.

It was not negligence as a matter of law to ride on the running board of an inclosed jitney bus, where the bus was crowded and the passenger could not get inside the entrance.

4. Carriers ⇐322—Finding held not to show court thought leg of passenger riding on running board was protruding.

In an action for injuries sustained by a jitney bus passenger riding on the running board, from contact with a standing truck, where there was evidence that the fender on the truck was higher than that on the bus, and might strike a passenger on the running board without first striking the fender of the bus, and the court's finding did not state what part of the two machines came in contact with plaintiff's leg, it cannot be said that the court adopted the theory that plaintiff's leg protruded, rather than the theory that the injury was due to the difference in height of the two fenders.

5. Carriers ⇐331(5)—Passenger bound to use ordinary care, but ordinary care depends on circumstances, though passenger on running board riding backwards.

A jitney bus passenger must use ordinary care, but whether, in a given case, it was a want of ordinary care to ride backwards on the running board, instead of facing in the direction in which the bus was traveling, must be determined by the circumstances of the case.

6. Carriers ⊂=318(7), 346(2)—Evidence held to support finding that injury was due to negligence of jitney bus operator, and that passenger was not negligent.

In an action for injuries to a jitney bus passenger riding on the running board, evidence held to warrant a finding that the accident was caused by the driver's negligence in driving too close to an ice wagon, and an implied finding that plaintiff was not guilty of a want of ordinary care in the position he assumed on the running board.

7. Carriers ⊂=322—Findings in jitney bus passenger's action for injuries not inconsistent.

In an action for injuries to a jitney bus passenger riding on the running board, a finding that it was not true that the bus had not stopped to take on passengers was not inconsistent with a finding that the bus had moved 8 or 10 feet before plaintiff got on, where the court also found that defendant stopped at a corner and that plaintiff got on the running board after the bus had gone 8 or 10 feet from the corner; and neither was a finding that plaintiff did not stand outside the automobile willfully, recklessly, and secretly, inconsistent with a finding that defendant did not know he was on the bus, and riding with his back in the direction the bus was going, where it was a question for the trial court whether he showed a want of ordinary care in riding backwards; and actual knowledge of his presence was not necessary.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frederick W. Houser, Judge.

Action by John Ivancich against W. T. Davies. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Duke Stone, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Rosecrans & Emme, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

LAWLOR, J. This is an appeal from a judgment for the plaintiff in an action for damages for injuries received by the plaintiff while riding on a Ford jitney bus. It is alleged that the accident was due to the negligence of the defendant in driving the bus, which he owned and operated. The case was tried by the court sitting without a jury.

The facts are as follows:

Appellant operated the jitney bus in the streets of San Pedro, county of Los Angeles, carrying passengers for hire. The bus had an extended body, which was inclosed all around, the seats running lengthwise along the sides of the car. The driver's seat was at the front on the left side, and the only entrance to the bus was through the side, at the driver's right. There were no seats between the driver's seat and the entrance, which was open at all times.

On the morning of April 14, 1919, at about 6:45 a. m., appellant was driving the bus north on Beacon street in the city of San Pedro. He stopped at the intersection of Sixth and Beacon streets to discharge and receive passengers. Respondent came from a restaurant across the street to board the bus, which had started, and proceeded about 8 or 10 feet, when respondent swung on the right-hand running board. All the seats in the bus were taken, and passengers were standing up inside. One passenger was standing in the entrance. Respondent rode on the running board, and at the time of the accident was holding on with his right hand and facing to the rear.

Appellant drove north on Beacon street until he came to Fifth street, where he turned east, and proceeded along Fifth street. While driving along Fifth street he drove so close to a truck of the Union Ice Company, which was standing by the curb, that the fender of the truck struck respondent's left leg, cutting and bruising it, and wrenching his knee. No other injury was done, either to the passenger or to the bus.

[1, 2] 1. The first point made by the appellant for reversal is that "Plaintiff was not a passenger, for the reason that he was not upon the bus with the knowledge of the driver." It is argued that—

"Until there is an acceptance—that is, until either within the express or implied knowledge of the carrier the person seeking to become a passenger has indicated his intention to become a passenger, which intention has been in some way acquiesced in—the relation of passenger and carrier does not arise, even though the person attempting to become a passenger is to pay his fare when required."

The finding is that respondent was a passenger for hire on the bus without the personal knowledge of appellant, and the fact that appellant had no actual knowledge of his presence, is not disputed.

In the case of street car transportation the relation of passenger and carrier may be established without the express knowledge of the carrier or employee in charge of the car. It was said in Hatcher v. Quincy Horse Ry. & Carrying Co., 181 Ill. App. 30:

"The stopping of a car at the customary place for the reception of passengers is an invitation to persons intending to become passengers to board the car, and is tantamount to an acceptance of such persons as passengers. [Italics ours.] Yet whether a person boarding such car does so for the purpose of becoming a passenger depends largely upon the intention of such person at the time of boarding such car. North Chicago St. R. Co. v. Williams, 140 Ill. 288; West Chicago St. R. Co. v. Manning, 170 Ill. 420. There must be a bona fide intention on the part of such person to become a passenger or such a state of facts that the person will be a passenger if he gets on the car. Chicago & E. I. R. Co. v. Jennings, 190 Ill. 484."

It is said in Booth on Street Railways, § 326:

"But it is not necessary that there should be an express contract to constitute the relation of passenger and carrier, nor that there should be a consummated contract. It may be implied from slight circumstances, and may arise before the payment of fare or entry into the car. The existence of the relation depends largely upon the intention of the person at the time he enters, or while attempting to enter."

It follows, then, that one who boards a street car at a regular stopping place becomes a passenger, whether or not the carrier actually knows of his presence on the car. In such a case knowledge is implied.

But appellant also contends that because respondent boarded the bus after it was in motion he did not become a passenger. It is also said in Booth on Street Railways, supra, that a person—

"is not necessarily a trespasser after he boards a car, even if no fare has been collected from him before he suffers an injury, simply because he has violated a rule of the company as to the mode of getting on."

It was declared in Sharrer v. Paxson et al., 171 Pa. 26, 33 Atl. 120, where a passenger had jumped upon a moving train and secured a standing on the step of the car before he was pushed from the step by the brakeman and killed:

"It is contended, however, that, inasmuch as the deceased reached the position from which he was pushed while the train was moving, his own negligence contributed to his death, and is a bar to this action. The attempt to board a moving train is undoubtedly a negligent and hazardous act, but if it is successful and the negligent party gets safely upon the car it will not justify or excuse the subsequent negligence of the company or its servants, by which he is injured."

Respondent in this case ran to catch the bus, and did get safely aboard before it had gone 10 feet from its last regular stopping place. The fact that he boarded the bus just after it had started did not operate to preclude him from becoming a passenger. It is true he had not paid his fare, but the custom was to collect it at the end of the journey, and respondent testified he had the money for the fare and was ready and willing to pay. Appellant also contends that—

"The mere intention to go on board a car, which intention has not been by acts or otherwise indicated to the carrier, does not render the person a passenger, although he may be entitled to transportation."

However, in this case respondent had executed his intention to become a passenger; he had safely boarded the bus. In the light of the authorities we have discussed as to the implied knowledge by appellant of respondent's presence on the bus, it must be held this was a sufficient indication of respondent's intention to become a passenger. Nor is this conclusion affected by the circumstance that he was riding on the running board. The rule is well settled that a person may be a passenger even though he is riding on the steps of a car. Birmingham Railway, Light & Power Co. v. Bynum, 139 Ala. 389, 36 South. 736; Sharrer v. Paxson et al., supra; Holloway v. Pasadena & Pacific Ry. Co., 130 Cal. 177, 62 Pac. 478; Seller v. Market-Street Ry. Co., 139 Cal. 268, 72 Pac. 1006. Hence, notwithstanding that respondent got aboard the bus while it was in motion, that he had not paid his fare, that he rode on the running board, and that appellant had no actual knowledge of his presence on the bus, he was none the less a passenger.

2. Appellant's next contention is that, although respondent may have been a passenger, he was guilty of contributory negligence both as matter of law and as matter of fact, and that this negligence bars a recovery; that respondent's—

"negligence not only contributed or helped bring on the accident, but was the sole cause thereof, because the evidence is uncontradicted that he would not have been injured except for the position assumed by him, without the knowledge of the driver."

Respondent testified there were so many people inside the bus he could not get in. He said:

"Well, I got on myself. I went right in the entrance of the door and immediately the machine started. * * * Here is the running board here, and here is the entrance. Then immediately when I got here he moved, started to go on to the north on Beacon street, and then I kind of thought, 'I will go in and get a seat.' At that time I seen I couldn't get in, and I was standing right here by this post, holding by the arm.

"Q. You held on there; stood in that position? A. Yes. * * *

"Q. Did you get inside the jitney bus at all? A. Yes; I got right here—I couldn't get in. I say when I got in, immediately when I got into the entrance of the door the jitney started. * * * I got in here, and the people was around here, and I could see the conditions, and I could not get in. I saw the driver, and then I caught hold of that frame that holds up the jitney roof right with my hand."

He further testified he was standing straight up facing the east, and continued:

"Well, I think the jitney bus skidded right to one side, and hit me; the fender of the Union Ice truck hit my knee. It caught the fender of the Union Ice truck on my left leg."

Four other passengers—Verne Ostendorf, John Dupic, M. Park Davies (appellant's son), and Richard Ireland—all testified they either saw respondent get on the running board, or saw him after he was there. They all, together with respondent himself, testified respondent was hanging on to the bus; Ireland and respondent testified he was holding on with his right hand. Dupic testified as follows:

"Q. Was Mr. Ivancich a passenger on the running board at the time of the hitting? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Was Mr. Ivancich's body swinging out? A. No, sir; he was hanging on them there poles.

"Q. Did he have his arm around it? A. His arm.

"Q. Up close, or leaning out? A. Up close."

He testified further:

"Q. What part of the bus were you riding on? A. The first—from Fourteenth street to Sixth street I was on the running board. * * * At Sixth street I got off there and tried to get in, and I got as far as the entrance. * * * I went around that side to get a seat, but I could only get as far as the entrance. * * *

"Q. But you were inside of the door? A. Yes. * * * Q. Everybody else had seats, didn't they? A. Yes; most of them were standing up in the back. * * *

"Q. Standing up? A. Yes.

"Q. There was space then left in there, wasn't there? A. No; you couldn't get in. I could not get in any further when I got on at Sixth street. I just had room to get in the doorway."

The witness also testified that after the bus turned into Fifth street respondent was facing the direction the bus was going. Appellant testified that there were passengers standing up right to the back of his seat, and there was one man standing in the entrance.

The court found that the bus was so crowded with passengers that respondent was unable to get a seat, and therefore rode on the running board, and that at the time of the accident respondent was riding on the running board with his back toward the Union Ice truck; that it was the custom of appellant "to take passengers on the running board of his jitney bus"; that the bus did not skid, but that the accident was caused through the negligence of appellant in driving so close to the truck that respondent's leg was caught between the bus and the truck; that the accident was not due to respondent's fault, carelessness and neglect; "that it is not true that plaintiff negligently and carelessly placed himself in a position so that as said automobile passed near another automobile or truck the same was caused to come slightly in contact with the plaintiff, all without the knowledge, information, or consent of the defendant;" that it is not true that defendant's bus had not stopped to take on passengers when plaintiff attempted to board the same; and "that it is not true that the plaintiff willfully, recklessly, and secretly swung on the side of said automobile, causing his body to hang outside, * * * and that he so continued in said position until he received the said injuries."

[3] Appellant asserts that—

"Where there is standing room inside of a common carrier vehicle a passenger standing on the platform, outside, is guilty of negligence as a matter of law."

In view of the evidence as to the crowded condition of the bus, and that respondent could not get inside the entrance, it cannot be maintained that the mere fact of his riding on the running board constituted negligence as matter of law. There is counter evidence that there was standing room in the rear of the bus, but this only raised a conflict which was resolved in the finding already stated.

[4] Appellant contends, and cites numerous authorities to the proposition that "the protrusion of limbs of the passenger, even to the minutest distance, will be regarded as such contributory negligence as will deprive him of recovery;" that inasmuch as it is found that no damage was done to the bus, respondent's body must have protruded beyond the side of the bus, and that this was negligence as matter of law, which caused the injury. We do not think this deduction necessarily follows. One George Miller gave testimony to the effect that the fender on the truck was higher than the one on the bus; also, that it would have been possible for the truck fender to have come in contact with a passenger on the running board of the bus without first striking the fender thereof. The finding does not state what part of the two machines came in contact with respondent's leg, but from the finding of liability it cannot be said that the trial court did not adopt respondent's theory of the accident, that—

"The leg was hurt, not because it was protruding out, but because the difference in the height of the fenders of the two machines allowed the fender of the bus to go under that of the ice truck, which naturally caught the person on the running board."

[5, 6] Appellant next claims:

"It was the plain and unmistakable duty of the plaintiff to ride with his face in the direction he was going, for by the slightest movement of his leg he would have avoided the same object that the bus in which he was riding avoided."

We are aware of no legal rule that a passenger must invariably face the direction the vehicle is going. It is the duty of a passenger to use ordinary care, and whether in a given instance riding backwards shows a want of ordinary care must be determined by the circumstances of the case. We have heretofore referred to the finding that respondent at the time of the accident was riding with his back toward the ice truck, and in view of the conflict in the evidence on the point the finding must be accepted. There was evidence that respondent's right arm encircled the upright or post of the bus; that by this means he held himself "up close," and that he was "not swinging out" nor "leaning out."

Respondent testified on cross-examination that he did not swing his leg out and that his attention was not "engaged elsewhere" as he went by the ice wagon; and that he was "facing out" when he was struck on the hip by the ice wagon.

"Q. Did you see the ice wagon before you were struck? A. Yes; I see the wagon before; of course I did.

"Q. How far were you from it when you saw it? A. I was no farther at all, because the ice wagon, you know, is long; probably 10 or 12 feet; and then they are right close, you know; they get right close, just enough to hit my knee, the fender of the Union Ice truck."

Since he was riding on the right-hand running board, and holding on with his right arm, respondent's back would naturally be toward the front of the bus. Moreover, from respondent's testimony that he was "facing out," the court may have concluded that he was looking to his left to see if the bus was coming close to any other vehicle. This is supported by the testimony that he saw the ice wagon before he was struck. If respondent was thus observant, the court might have regarded the position of his body as without any special significance. In any event, we cannot say from the evidence that the finding that the accident was caused through the negligence of appellant in driving too close to the ice wagon, or the implied finding that respondent did not show a want of ordinary care in the position he assumed on the running board cannot be sustained.

As already shown, in addition to appellant's contention that respondent was guilty of contributory negligence as matter of law in the particulars we have discussed, he urges that as matter of fact respondent contributed to the injury, and that the evidence is not sufficient to sustain the findings on that issue. We think that, upon the evidence we have set forth, the findings are amply supported. Although respondent got on the running board while the bus was in motion, he was safely aboard before it turned into Fifth street. There is evidence of such a crowded condition of the car as would justify him in remaining on the running board. The testimony that he was holding on with his right arm and riding "up close" to the body of the bus—that he was "not swinging out" nor "leaning out," and that he did not swing his leg out—is not contradicted. It was also shown that the fender of the ice truck was high enough to have missed the fender of the bus and still have struck a passenger on the running board. It will not be necessary to repeat what we have said about the direction he was facing when the collision occurred. The evidence abundantly supports the findings.

3. Appellant contends that certain findings of the court are inconsistent, and that therefore the conclusions of law and the judgment cannot be sustained. He attributes inconsistency to the findings that appellant had no knowledge of respondent's position on the bus, and to the one that respondent was a passenger. As we have shown, it was not necessary in order to constitute respondent a passenger that appellant should have had actual knowledge of his presence on the bus. The point is without merit.

[7] It is insisted that the finding that it is not true the bus had not stopped to take on passengers is inconsistent with the one that the bus had moved 8 or 10 feet before respondent got on. We perceive no inconsistency here, for, considered with another finding that "defendant stopped said jitney bus at the corner * * * and that the plaintiff got on the running board * * * after it had gone about 8 or 10 feet from said corner," it is apparent that the meaning of the finding is that the bus had stopped for passengers, but that respondent did not get on until it had proceeded 8 or 10 feet.

The finding that respondent did not stand outside of the automobile willfully, recklessly, and secretly is claimed to be inconsistent with the finding that appellant did not know respondent was on the bus, and that he was riding with his back in the direction the bus was going. But, in view of our conclusion that actual knowledge of respondent's presence was not necessary, and that it was for the trial court to determine whether respondent showed a want of ordinary care in riding backwards, these findings are not inconsistent.

Judgment affirmed.

DE LEON v. PACIFIC MUT. INS. CO. OF CALIFORNIA. (L. A. 6963.)

1. Insurance ⊂=530—Recovery under one provision of accident policy for loss of sight precluded recovery of monthly indemnity under provision for loss of time.

Where loss of sight occurred contemporaneously with the accident, the insured, on recovery of amount specified in accident policy as indemnity for the loss of the sight, to be paid with monthly indemnity "for the time between the date of accident and date of such loss," could not recover indemnity for loss of time under provision of policy providing for monthly indemnity for loss of time.

2. Appeal and error ⊂=1180(1)—Motion to substitute judgment for greater amount for that rendered on verdict not a waiver of right to judgment on verdict.

Grant of plaintiff's motion to substitute for the judgment entered on the verdict a judgment for a greater amount than the verdict on condition that he waive right to smaller judgment did not preclude plaintiff from claiming the right to a judgment for amount of verdict on reversal by the appellate court of the judgment for the greater amount, as the reversal operated on the condition also, and had the effect of restoring verdict.

3. Costs ⊂=241—Apportioned between parties on affirmance of one judgment and reversal of other.

Where Supreme Court, on appeal from two judgments, reversed one and affirmed the other, the costs of appeal should be apportioned between the parties in as equitable a manner as seems practicable.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Action by George De Leon against the Pacific Mutual Insurance Company of California. Verdict for plaintiff, and from the judgment entered thereon, and from the judgment for a greater amount entered after granting motion to vacate the judgment on such verdict, and to enter judgment for the greater amount, defendant appeals. Subsequent judgment reversed, and judgment on verdict affirmed.

Loeb, Walker & Loeb, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

J. H. Ryckman, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. This is an action on a policy of accident insurance. In accord with the verdict of the jury plaintiff was given judgment for $300, said judgment being entered August 8, 1919. Subsequently defendant gave notice of intention to move for new trial, which, so far as the record shows, was never acted upon. Plaintiff, subsequent to such notice of motion, gave notice of a motion to vacate the judgment for $300, based on the verdict of the jury, and to enter a judgment for $640. Over the objection of defendant this motion was granted by order made September 29, 1919. Defendant appeals both from the judgment as entered August 8, 1919, and from the order or judgment made September 29, 1919, whereby plaintiff was given judgment for $640.

Plaintiff's action as shown by his complaint, was for $300 alleged to be due under the policy for the loss, by reason of the accident, of the sight of one eye, and $80 per month for eight months because of inability, by reason of the accident, to work at his occupation during that time. This was his theory throughout the trial, and until after the judgment of August 8, 1919. He never consented to waive his claim for the $300 for loss of sight of one eye until when, after the entry of judgment, the trial judge decided that he could not have both such $300 and a payment for loss of time. The defendant by its answer denied that plaintiff's loss of sight of one eye was caused by the accident, claiming that the same was due to a senile cataract of long standing. It further set up as a defense falsity of the statement in plaintiff's application with relation to his power of vision.

Upon these issues the case was tried, with a jury. The jury found a general verdict for plaintiff for $300, for the loss of the sight of the eye. It also, as a part of its verdict, answered four special questions submitted to it, the answers being substantially that the injury was due to "a blow of a bolt by his fellow workman," that there was no senile cataract at the time plaintiff made his application for a policy, that the "concussion cataract" was the sole cause of the loss of sight in plaintiff's left eye, and that from the date of the accident (September 20, 1918) to the date of the verdict (August 7, 1919) plaintiff was totally and continuously disabled from the performance of all duty pertaining to his occupation. It seems that upon the trial defendant claimed that under the terms of the policy plaintiff could not recover any monthly indemnity in addition to the $300 for loss of sight in one eye, if the loss of sight occurred immediately upon the happening of the accident. The trial judge being in doubt upon this proposition, upon his suggestion it was stipulated as follows:

"At the suggestion of the court, it was agreed that the jury was to find whether the defendant was liable or not, and if they found that the defendant was liable, then they were to bring in a verdict for $300, and that the court would then take under advisement the question as to whether, under the circumstances of this case, the evidence presented, and so forth, they were also liable for $640."

After the entry of the judgment the trial court concluded that plaintiff "could not recover under two articles" of the policy. Then followed the motion to vacate the judgment for $300, and to substitute the judgment for $640. The action of the trial court in this respect was protested by defendant, it being claimed that the court had no power to so interfere with the judgment already given and entered. It should also be stated that, before granting the motion, the trial court asked counsel for plaintiff, "if now, and for all time, he waives recovery under article 3 for $300," and he answered in the affirmative.

An examination of the record satisfies us that, upon the question whether the loss of the sight of the eye was wholly due to the accident, the verdict of the jury in favor of the plaintiff finds sufficient support in the evidence. There was a conflict in the evidence, it is true, but there was substantial evidence in favor of plaintiff's claim in this respect. This is also true as to the issue relating to the truth or falsity of the statement in the application for the policy as to the power of vision of plaintiff. As to this the preponderance of evidence may fairly be said to be with plaintiff. The jury was fairly and correctly instructed as to the issues thus presented, and no good reasson appears to us for concluding that the verdict for $300 should be disturbed. Under the terms of the policy, which was for $900, the plaintiff was entitled to receive one-third of the principal sum for the loss of sight of either eye. A provision in the judgment that a monthly indemnity not to exceed $640 is to be added to the $300 by the court if it shall decide that a monthly indemnity should be paid under the policy need not be considered in view of the subsequent decision of the court that it could not be added. This brings us to a consideration of what followed the verdict and the judgment based thereon.

[1] It seems to us very clear that, in view of the terms of the policy, plaintiff, having and insisting upon the right to recover $300 for the loss of sight of an eye, could not recover any monthly indemnity in addition if the loss of sight was immediately caused by the accident. That it was so immediately caused he himself testified, and the jury substantially so found by the third and fourth answers to the special interrogatories. Article 1, relative to indemnities, provides, it is true, for monthly indemnities for the time, not exceeding 36 months, that such accident immediately, totally, and continuously disables from the performance of every kind of duty pertaining to the insured's occupation. Article 3, however, provides a schedule of indemnities for certain losses. This amount is to be paid with "the accident monthly indemnity for the time between the date of accident and date of such loss." The schedule provides that "for loss of * * * sight of either eye" there shall be paid "one-third principal sum." Article 11 provides:

"The right to make claim for loss of life or for any total loss named in the schedule of indemnities, shall exclude all other claims based upon the same accident, except a claim from monthly indemnity provided in article 3. * * *"

Of course, courts are bound by the terms of the contract between the parties, and it seems to us clear beyond question that the asserted rights of plaintiff, pressed by him to verdict and judgment of compensation for the loss of sight of one eye, given him by article 3, excluded any claim by him for monthly indemnity under article 1, except such as was allowed by article 3, viz. indemnity "for the time between the date of the accident and date of such loss." Admittedly, it must be held here that there was no such time, the loss of the sight occurring contemporaneously with the accident. It may be that under the policy plaintiff could originally have waived all claim for a total loss under article 3, and proceeded under article 1 for a monthly indemnity for loss of time only. As to this it is not necessary here to decide. He did not do so, but elected to assert his claim under article 3, as well as a claim under article 1. Certainly, after pressing this claim to verdict and judgment, he could not properly be allowed, over the objection of the other party, to recover upon the theory of a waiver of all rights under article 3, a theory upon which the action was not instituted, or tried, or decided. It follows that the judgment for $640, given September 29, 1919, finds no proper support in the record. The only recovery proper, in view of the circumstances, was one for $300 for the loss of the sight of one eye.

[2] This being the situation, it is earnestly urged by defendant that plaintiff, as a condition precedent to the granting of his motion to vacate the $300 judgment and substitute a judgment for $640, having waived for all time any recovery under article 3 for $300, he cannot now have his judgment for the $300. We see little force in this claim. His motion was substantially one for the substitution of a judgment of $640 for the $300 judgment, and not a motion for the mere vacating of the $300 judgment. The two things were inseparably united. The whole purpose of the requirement by the learned trial judge of the express waiver of any claim under article 3 was to prevent the enforcement by plaintiff of any such claim in the event that he was given a recovery under article 1, and the waiver amounted to no more than that. He has been given no such recovery, for it is now determined on appeal that, in view of the circumstances, no such recovery could properly be allowed, and the award is set aside. With the setting aside on appeal of the award for monthly indemnity, the waiver and the vacating of the first judgment, which seem to us to be inseparably connected with such award, and were included in the same order, also fall, and we have the former judgment for $300 in full force and effect (unless also reversed on this appeal), except as to the provision for the possible addition by the trial court of a monthly indemnity, which provision became ineffective for any purpose on the decision of the trial court that no such addition could be made.

We have not attempted herein to comment on the practice followed in the trial court after the entry of the first judgment, or as to the attempted postponement of the determination of the question of monthly indemnity and the attempted reservation in the judgment of the right to subsequently add the same. It is apparent that the sole desire of the learned trial judge was to reach the correct and just conclusion as to the rights of the respective parties. The method adopted was, however, somewhat novel, and it may well be doubted whether the trial court could, on motion, against the protest of a party, vacate a judgment which has been entered except on a ground and in the manner specified by our statutes. It is to be noted that the stipulation to which we have referred did not purport to authorize such action as was in fact had.

[3] In view of the fact that the appeal is from two judgments, and that one of the judgments appealed from should be affirmed and the other reversed, the costs of appeal should be apportioned between the parties in as equitable a manner as seems practicable.

The judgment or order of September 29, 1919, is reversed. The judgment entered August 8, 1919, is affirmed. Appellant shall recover the amount paid by it for filing record in the appellate court and one-fourth of the amounts paid the superior court clerk and stenographer for preparing the record on appeal. Neither party shall recover any amount as costs for printing briefs.

STATE v. SECURITY SAV. BANK et al.

(Sac. 2890.)

1. Escheat ⊂⊃6—Statutes for escheat of bank deposits do not provide for actual seizure of money.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1273, and St. 1915, p. 1106, § 5, do not provide for an actual seizure by the state of any money in bank unclaimed for 20 years, either before or after judgment escheating it, but do provide, with respect to each depositor, for the payment to the state by the bank of the debt the bank owes the depositor; the statutes not being intended to apply exclusively to moneys held by the bank as custodian or bailee.

2. Constitutional law ⊂⊃42—Bank proceeded against for escheat of deposits can question validity of law.

A bank proceeded against by the state for the escheat of deposits under Code Civ. Proc. § 1273, and St. 1915, p. 1106, § 5, has an interest sufficient to authorize it to challenge the validity of the law on its own account.

3. Constitutional law ⊂⊃309(2)—Escheat ⊂⊃6—State cannot, by mere statutory declaration, appropriate bank deposit.

Under Const. art. 1, § 13, the state cannot, by a mere statutory declaration, take away the right of the depositor to his bank deposit and appropriate to its own use his property therein, so that the depositor is a necessary party to any action by the state to enforce payment of the money due on the deposit into the state treasury, and the bank has the right to insist that the depositor be brought into the case as party by some valid process or notice, and can contend that the process and notice prescribed by Code Civ. Proc. § 1273, and St. 1915, p. 1106, § 5, providing for the escheat of bank deposits unclaimed for 20 years, do not constitute due process of law.

4. Escheat ⊂⊃6—Proceeding by state to escheat unclaimed deposit quasi in rem.

The state's proceeding under Code Civ. Proc. § 1273, to escheat a bank deposit unclaimed for 20 years, is not an action in personam, nor is the judgment a personal judgment against the bank and the depositor, but the proceeding is quasi in rem.

5. Constitutional law ⊂⊃309(2)—Escheat ⊂⊃6—Method prescribed for notice of proceeding to escheat unclaimed bank deposit not unreasonable.

Method prescribed by Code Civ. Proc. § 1273, for imparting notice to the bank depositor of the state's proceeding to escheat the deposit, unclaimed for 20 years, being that of publication in a newspaper of general circulation in the county where the state capitol is located, held not unreasonable or inadequate to invalidate the procedure under Const. art. 1, § 13, providing that no person shall be deprived of his property without due process of law.

6. Constitutional law ⊂⊃309(2)—Escheat ⊂⊃6—State can take charge of unclaimed and unchanged bank deposit on general notice by publication.

It is within the power of the state, pursuant to Code Civ. Proc. § 1273, and St. 1915, p. 1106, § 5, to take charge of bank deposits unclaimed and unchanged for 20 years under the general notice by publication provided by Code Civ. Proc. § 1273, despite the claim of the bank that there can be no valid service on the depositor by publication unless there has been some preliminary proof to the court that the depositor resides out of the state or has departed from it.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Peter J. Shields, Judge.

Action by the State of California against the Security Savings Bank, a corporation, and others. From judgment escheating certain bank deposits to the State, defendant Bank appeals. Affirmed.

See, also, 154 Pac. 1070.

McCutchen, Willard, Mannon & Greene, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Frank L. Guerena, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the State.

Charles C. Conner, of San Francisco, amicus curiæ, on behalf of several defendants.

SHAW, J. This is an action by the state of California to declare an escheat of certain bank deposits, under the provisions of section 1273 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Judgment was given for the plaintiff in the court below. The defendant bank alone appeals.

Section 1273 declares that when money is on deposit in a bank in this state and the depositor does not, for a period of more than 20 years, deposit any more money in the account, nor draw out any part thereof, nor claim the same, and neither the depositor nor any claimant has filed with the bank any notice of his present residence such deposit, with the accumulations of interest thereon, shall escheat to the state.

The section then further provides that the Attorney General, on being informed of such deposits—

"shall commence an action or actions in the name of the state of California, in the superior court of the county of Sacramento, in which shall be joined as parties the bank or banks in which the moneys are deposited and the names of all such depositors."

With respect to process the section declares:

"Service of process in such action or actions shall be made by delivery of a copy of the complaint and summons to the president, cashier or managing officer of each defendant bank, and by publication of a copy of such summons in a newspaper of general circulation published in said county for a period of four weeks."

All or any number of banks or depositors may be included in one action. Upon the trial, if it be determined that the moneys deposited in any bank are unclaimed, as previously stated, the court must render judgment in favor of the state, declaring that said moneys have escheated to the state and directing payment thereof into the state treasury. This section was added to the Code in 1915. Stats. 1915, p. 107. At the same session section 15 of the Bank Act was amended. Stats. 1915, p. 1106, § 5. It provides that moneys remaining unclaimed in a bank by a depositor who had not drawn any money therefrom or made any further deposits thereto, nor filed any notice of residence, for the period of 20 years, shall be deposited with the state treasurer "after judgment in the manner provided in the Code of Civil Procedure." It further provides that—

"At the time of issuing the summons in the action provided for in section 1273 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the clerk shall also issue a notice signed by him, giving the title and number of said action, and referring to the complaint therein, and directed to all persons, other than than those named as defendants therein, claiming any interest in any deposit mentioned in said complaint, and requiring them to appear within sixty days after the first publication of such summons, and show cause, if any they have, why the moneys involved in said action should not be deposited with the state treasurer as in said section provided, and notifying them that if they do not so appear and show cause, the state will apply to the court for the relief demanded in the complaint. A copy of said notice shall be attached to and published with the copy of said summons required to be published by said section, and at the end of the copy of such notice so published there shall be a statement of the date of the first publication of said summons and notice."

This section further provides that upon the completion of the publication of the summons and notice and the service of the summons—

"the court shall have full and complete jurisdiction over the state, and the said deposits and of the person of every one having or claiming any interest in the said deposits, or any of them, and shall have full and complete jurisdiction to hear and determine the issues therein, and render the appropriate judgment thereon."

The case presents the single question whether or not the provisions of the statute requiring process in actions of this character are valid under the Fourteenth Amendment of the Constitution of the United States and section 13, article 1, of our Constitution, providing that no person shall be deprived of his property without due process of law.

It is clear that section 15 of the Banking Act and section 1273 aforesaid, although separately enacted, relate to the same subject and are to be considered and construed as if both were contained in a single act, at least with respect to the provisions for process and notice in the action under section 1273. The provisions for notice in section 15 apply to such an action and constitute a part of the process necessary to confer jurisdiction upon the court to proceed therein.

[1] These statutes speak of "amounts of money * * * deposited with any bank," and which "have remained unclaimed"; they refer to the "money deposited," and state that such "moneys" escheat to the state, and provide for judgment "commanding said bank to forthwith deposit all such moneys with the state treasurer." This language, if taken literally according to its legal significance, would be apropriate to describe money in the custody of the bank as bailee of its depositors. It is evident, however, from the context and from the purpose and object to be accomplished, that it was not intended to apply exclusively to moneys held by the bank as such custodian or bailee, although possibly it might include such special deposits. It is not an accurate use of language to speak of the general deposits in an ordinary bank as the money of the depositors. When a general deposit is made with a bank, the title to the money delivered to it passes at once to the bank. The relation thereby established between the bank and the depositor is that of debtor and creditor and not that of bailee and bailor. The bank is the debtor and the depositor the creditor to the amount of the deposit. It is of some importance, in view of the argument presented, to note that the statutes in question do not provide for an actual seizure of any money, either before or after the judgment, but do provide, with respect to each depositor, for the payment to the state by the bank of the debt the bank owes to the depositor.

The only appellant in the case is the Security Savings Bank. None of the depositors appeared in the action and their rights cannot be here adjudicated, except so far as may be necessary in determining the rights of the bank.

The appellant claims that the law is void in all particulars because the notices provided in the action are not sufficient with respect to the depositors whose rights are to be affected thereby, and that as the judgment provided for, when given, requires the bank to pay the money due the depositors into the state treasury without their consent, it is invalid as to the bank itself, because such judgment will not protect it against the subsequent demands of the depositors in case they should appear and claim the money so deposited.

[2, 3] It is claimed on behalf of the state, as a preliminary objection, that the defendant bank has no interest which authorizes it to dispute the validity of the law with respect to the depositors. It is not necessary to determine whether or not it could vicariously for its depositors raise the objection that the law is invalid as to them. The bank has an interest sufficient to authorize it to challenge the validity of the law on its own account. The deposit, as above shown, creates a contract between the bank and its depositors whereby the bank takes the money of the depositor and agrees to repay the amount thereof in whole or in part at any time on demand. Until payment is demanded by the depositor the bank may loan the money deposited with it, or a large part thereof, at interest for its own benefit. It therefore has an interest in keeping the money and the right to refuse payment on a deposit account until demand therefor is made by the depositor, or some one by him authorized, or by his successor in interest. It follows that, if such demand is made by another, the bank may require from such person reasonable proof of his authority. And when a third person who has not acquired the legal title to the chose in action of the depositor but who merely claims a right to demand and receive payment of the amount deposited, sues the bank to enforce such claim, the bank has the right, for its own protection, to insist that the depositor be made a party to the action to answer as to his interest.

"The person with the legal title to the demand in question should usually be made a party, as otherwise he might proceed at law notwithstanding the decree." 15 Ency. Pl. & Pr. 593.

See, also, Wilson v. Castro, 31 Cal. 427.

It cannot be doubted that the state is not the holder of the legal title of the depositor. That title has not been transferred to the state by any act of the depositor, and the state cannot, by a mere statutory declaration, take away the right of the depositor and appropriate to its own use his property therein. Const. art. 1, § 13. The depositor is therefore a necessary party to any action by the state to enforce payment of the money due on deposits into the state treasury, and the bank has the right to insist that the depositors be brought into the case as parties by some process or notice that the law recognizes as valid. It therefore has the right to contend that the process and notice prescribed by these statutes no not constitute due process of law.

The claim of the bank in that behalf is that in order to make a valid service of process upon the depositors there must be either personal service upon them or valid constructive service; that in an action in which the judgment asked for may ultimately deprive the depositors of the title to their demands against the bank, as is the case here, the service of the process against those who reside in the state and can be found therein must be a personal service upon them and each of them, and that there can be no valid constructive service upon any of them, unless it is shown to the satisfaction of the court that the persons so served are not residents of the state, or are absent therefrom, or have concealed themselves to avoid service of process, or cannot with due diligence be found therein. The statute does not require any showing of the facts thus claimed to be necessary to authorize a constructive service, and it does not require personal service upon any of the depositors. The record does not show that any personal service has been made on any of them, or that any showing was made preliminary to the publication of the summons and notice or at all, to the effect that the depositors or any of them are nonresidents or absent from the state or have concealed themselves to avoid service of process or cannot with due diligence be found in the state. If the contention of the bank in this respect is sound, the statute is contrary to the Constitution, both of this state and of the United States, in failing to require due process of law on the parties whose property is to be taken, and the entire proceeding is without force or validity.

[4] The argument of the appellant on this subject is mainly based on the proposition that the proceeding authorized by section 1273 is an action in personam, and that the judgment therein to be rendered is a personal judgment against the bank and the several depositors made defendants therein. This proposition is not maintainable. The judgment does not seek to declare or enforce any obligation of the depositors, or any of them, to any other person or persons. Its sole object with respect to them is to act upon the obligations they respectively hold against the bank, to effect a substitution of the state for the bank with respect to such obligation, and to transfer the title of that particular property of the depositors, respectively, to the state. Such proceedings are not proceedings strictly in rem; but they are proceedings quasi in rem. The proceeding is not in that respect distinguishable from an ordinary garnishee process against a debtor of a defendant to appropriate the debt to the payment of the plaintiff's demand. In such cases the defendant in the action may be a nonresident, or not within reach of the process of the state court. But if service is made on the garnishee, the court has jurisdiction to dispose of that asset of the defendant and apply it to the payment of the plaintiff's debt. In Pennoyer v. Neff, 95 U. S. 727, 24 L. Ed. 565, the court said:

"The law assumes that property is always in the possession of its owner, in person or by agent; and it proceeds upon the theory that its seizure will inform him, not only that it is taken into the custody of the court, but that he must look to any proceedings authorized by law upon such seizure for its condemnation and sale. Such service may also be sufficient in cases where the object of the action is to reach and dispose of property in the state, or of some interest therein, by enforcing a contract or a lien respecting the same, or to partition it among different owners, or, when the public is a party, to condemn and appropriate it for a public purpose. In other words, such service may answer in all actions which are substantially proceedings in rem."

The court was there discussing the validity of attachment proceedings against one who was a nonresident of the state and had no service of process except by publication. In Cooper v. Reynolds, 77 U. S. (10 Wall.) 317, 19 L. Ed. 931, the court was considering the validity of a sale rendered upon a judgment in attachment where the only service upon the defendant was by publication. The court said:

"Jurisdiction of the res is obtained by a seizure under process of the court, whereby it is held to abide such order as the court may make concerning it. * * * So also while the general rule in regard to jurisdiction in rem requires the actual seizure and possession of the res by the officer of the court, such jurisdiction may be acquired by acts which are of equivalent import, and which stand for and represent the dominion of the court over the thing, and in effect subject it to the control of the court. Among this latter class is the levy of a writ of attachment or seizure of real estate, which, being incapable of removal, and lying within the territorial jurisdiction of the court, is for all practical purposes brought under the jurisdiction of the court by the officer's levy of the writ and return of that fact to the court. So the writ of garnishment or attachment, or other form of service, on a party holding a fund which becomes the subject of litigation, brings that fund under the jurisdiction of the court, though the money may remain in the actual custody of one not an officer of the court."

The service of the summons on the bank is, under the doctrine thus established, the equivalent of a seizure of the property of each depositor in his account with the bank, and gives the court jurisdiction over it to the same extent as in cases in garnishment and other proceedings quasi in rem. To the same point, see 6 Corp. Jur. p. 90, where many cases are cited.

With respect to the question of the kind of process necessary against the owner of the chose in action in such cases, the rule is declared to be that the state has power to dispose of such specific property and adjudicate the title thereto without personal notice to the owner thereof, provided the substituted notice is reasonable and adequate. In Roller v. Holly, 176 U. S. 409, 20 Sup. Ct. 414, 44 L. Ed. 520, on this point the court said:

"It is manifest that the requirement of notice would be of no value whatever, unless such notice were reasonable and adequate for the purpose."

In Arndt v. Griggs, 134 U. S. 321, 10 Sup. Ct. 559, 33 L. Ed. 918, in a decision holding that a decree to quiet title to real estate was valid if made upon a regular service by publication the court said that the state—

"has control over property within its limits; and the condition of ownership of real estate therein, whether the owner be stranger or citizen, is subjection to its rules concerning the holding, the transfer, liability to obligations, private or public, and the modes of establishing titles thereto. It cannot bring the person of a nonresident within its limits—its process goes not out beyond its borders—but it may determine the extent of his title to real estate within its limits; and for the purpose of such determination may provide any reasonable methods of imparting notice."

This brings us to the question whether or not the notice to the depositors provided by the statute is reasonable and adequate under the circumstances.

It is not contended that the facts required to be stated in the summons and notice to be published are insufficient to apprise any depositor who may read them of the nature of the proceeding and the object sought. The only serious objection to the efficacy of the publication as notice is that the statute requires nothing more than it be made in a newspaper of general circulation published in Sacramento county, and that this is not a reasonable notice with respect to persons having deposits in banks doing business in other counties. We see no force in this objection. A person may bring an action in any county in the state to recover money on contract, may obtain jurisdiction of the defendant for the purpose of attachment by publication, and may serve garnishee process on any debtor of the defendant who can be found in any county of the state. Code Civ. Proc. §§ 412, 413, 540, and section 542, subd. 5. The superior court of such county has jurisdiction of such action although the defendant may never have resided therein and the person served as garnishee may reside in some other county and the contract may have been made elsewhere. The publication in such cases in the county in which the suit is brought is the universal practice. Yet it would be no more likely to give notice to the defendant in the action than the notice provided for in these statutes. The validity of judgments regularly obtained in that manner has never been questioned. Our numerous statutes provide for many proceedings, either strictly in rem or quasi in rem, in which the property rights of individuals are affected and the notice provided for is solely by publication in some newspaper, or, in some instances, by merely the posting of notices in public places in the county, and in which the residence of the person to be affected thereby is regarded as immaterial to the validity of the proceeding. Crall v. Poso Irr. Dist., 87 Cal. 148, 26 Pac. 797; Estate of Warfield, 22 Cal. 63, 83 Am. Dec. 49; Rogers v. King, 22 Cal. 72; Halleck v. Moss, 22 Cal. 274; State v. McGlynn, 20 Cal. 270, 81 Am. Dec. 118; Irwin v. Scriber, 18 Cal. 500. In Bennett v. Creditors, 22 Cal. 41, and Brewster v. Ludekins, 19 Cal. 170, it was held that the court acquired jurisdiction, under the statute (Stats. 1860, p. 283), to discharge an insolvent upon notice by publication for four weeks in a newspaper of the county in which the debtor resides. Many similar examples could be given, but we deem it unnecessary to pursue this subject further.

[5] In view of the nature of the proceeding, the character of the property to be affected thereby, and the conditions to which they apply, we think it cannot be said that the method prescribed for imparting notice to the depositor is unreasonable or inadequate. The complaint must show that the deposit accounts in question have remained unclaimed and unchanged by any deposit or withdrawal for a period of 20 years, and that no person claiming it has filed any notice with the bank showing his present residence. Ever since the year 1893, every savings bank in the state has been required to publish annually in a newspaper of the city or town in which it is situated a sworn statement showing the amount of each deposit therein, the name and last known residence of each depositor, and the fact of his death, if known, in all cases where the depositor has not made a deposit or withdrawal for more than 10 years next preceding, except where the depositor is known to be living and the deposit is less than $50. Stats. 1893, p. 183. In 1897 these requirements were extended to all banks of deposit. Stats. 1897, p. 27. In 1905 these provisions were incorporated into the Code. Civ. Code, § 583b. It is to be presumed that these statutes have been obeyed by the banks concerned. It may fairly be inferred that the owner of a deposit under $50 who has not claimed it for 20 years has either forgotten it or abandoned it. It is altogether improbable, after these annual publications of deposits over $50, that any person who resided in the county in which the bank was situated would remain ignorant thereof, or that, being aware of it, he would not have claimed it before 20 years had elapsed. It may reasonably be presumed that the owners of such accounts are nonresidents of such county or of the state, or that they are dead and that their next of kin are nonresidents. It would follow that no county would be a more suitable place in which to give a general notice of this character than the county of Sacramento. The Legislature is the authority that must determine questions of this character, and the determination is final unless the court can say that it is unreasonable. As we are unable to reach such conclusion, we must hold the provision valid.

[6] The further claim is made that there can be no valid service by publication in any case unless there has been some preliminary proof to the court as foundation therefor that the person to be affected by the published notice resides out of the state or has departed from the state, or cannot after due diligence be found within the state, or conceals himself to avoid service of summons. One or the other of these facts are required to be stated, by the Code, in order to obtain an order for publication of summons in an ordinary action. Code Civ. Proc. § 412. We are cited to no decision holding that preliminary proof to the court of either of these things is essential to constitute due process of law in case of service by publication. There are, of course, very many decisions holding that a publication under the Code cannot be valid unless this section is complied with. But such decisions do not establish the proposition that the Legislature is without power to authorize service by publication in any case where such facts are not established prima facie by some preliminary showing. The decisions already cited show that rights can be affected and changed upon notice by publication without such preliminary showing. We perceive no reason why the Legislature, when providing for a special class of persons such as the depositors here in question, may not itself determine that the facts authorize a substituted service. We are of the opinion that it is within the power of the state, under circumstances such as appear in the present case, to take charge of the deposits such as are here involved, upon the general notice provided by this statute. Cunnius v. Reading School Dist., 198 U. S. 470, 25 Sup. Ct. 721, 49 L. Ed. 1125, 3 Ann. Cas. 1121; Nelson v. Blinn, 197 Mass. 279, 83 N. E. 889, 15 L. R. A. (N. S.) 651, 125 Am. St. Rep. 364, 14 Ann. Cas. 147.

Section 1272 of the Code of Civil Procedure allows "a person not a party or privy" to "any proceeding had under this title" to petition the court at any time within five years after final judgment in such proceeding for another judgment directing that the property declared in the previous judgment to have escheated to the state be delivered to him, or, if it is money, that the amount be paid to him by the state and be declared to be his own. The title referred to is title 8, the subhead of which is "Escheated Estates," and it includes sections 1272 and 1273. Although the language of section 1273, literally interpreted, would bar all persons whatever from afterward claiming the property adjudged to have escheated, section 1272 indicates that it was not intended to be final except as to persons who were "parties or privies" to the proceeding. As the process provided for in the proceeding under section 1273 purports to run to all the world, it may be difficult to give effect to the phrase "party or privy," as used in section 1272, unless it is confined to persons who appeared in the proceeding and those claiming under such persons. If it has this meaning, the judgment under section 1273 does not finally bar the depositors or others interested who did not appear, but merely sets the five-year period running against them. As we remarked at the outset, no persons appeared or appealed except the bank, and the rights of other persons cannot be adjudicated on this appeal. Consequently we express no opinion upon the question just stated. We mention it only to forestall the inference that we have decided it by implication.

It may be true, as the appellant insists, that the result of proceedings under this statute may in rare instances operate unjustly upon depositors, even if they have an additional five years in which to appear. This objection is answered by the Supreme Court of the United States in Blinn v. Nelson, 222 U. S. 7, 32 Sup. Ct. 2, 56 L. Ed. 65, Ann. Cas. 1913B, 555, by the following remark:

"Now and then an extraordinary case may turn up, but constitutional law, like other mortal contrivances, has to take some chances, and in the great majority of instances, no doubt, justice will be done."

We find no ground upon which the appeal can be sustained.

The judgment is affirmed.

FEDERAL MUT. LIABILITY INS. CO. v. INDUSTRIAL ACC. COMMISSION OF CALIFORNIA et al. (S. F. 9608.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 26, 1921.)

Master and servant ⟹386(1) — Expenses of support of minor deducted from contributions to dependent parent claiming compensation.

Under the Workmen's Compensation Insurance and Safety Act as amended by St. 1917, p. 840, § 9, subd. 3, par. (c) cl. 2, giving to partial dependents three times the annual amount devoted by deceased to the support of the partial dependent, a mother, to whom her minor son made contributions, which she expended for the support of the family, of which her son was a member, is not entitled to compensation based on the total contributions of the son, but must allow as deductions therefrom the amount expended for the support of the son, notwithstanding her legal obligation to support him.

In Bank.

Proceedings under the Workmen's Compensation Act by Harriet Baldwin, individually and as guardian ad litem and trustee, to recover compensation for the death of Charles Frederick Baldwin, brought against the Pacific Marine & Construction Company, for whom was substituted the Federal Mutual Liability Insurance Company, the insurance carrier. The Industrial Commission awarded compensation to the petitioner, and the insurance carrier brings writ of review. Award annulled, with directions.

Cooley & Lachmund, of San Francisco, for petitioner.

A. E. Graupner, of San Francisco, for respondents.

SHAW, J. This is a proceeding to review an award in favor of Harriet Baldwin for the sum of $3,654.90, made on September 3, 1920, on account of the death of her son, Charles Frederick Baldwin, which occurred on January 23, 1920, from an injury to him arising out of and in the course of his employment. The Pacific Marine & Construction Company was the employer, and the petitioner was the insurance carrier of the employer. It was substituted for the employer, and the award is against it as such carrier.

The Commission found that the decedent left surviving him his mother, Harriet Baldwin, and that she was partially dependent upon him for support; that the annual amount devoted by him to the support of his mother was $1,218.30, and that the death benefit was $3,654.90.

The award was made under the Workmen's Compensation, Insurance and Safety Act as revised and amended in 1917. It provides that in a case where an injury causes death to an employee, and such employee leaves one or more persons partially dependent upon him for support the said dependents shall be allowed $100 for funeral expenses and "in addition thereto, a death benefit which shall amount to three times the annual amount devoted by the deceased to the support of the person or persons so partially dependent." Section 9, subd. 3, par. c, cl. 2, Stats. 1917, p. 840. The findings further show that for the year preceding his death the decedent was living with his mother, his sister Virginia, and his brother Gordon, as members of the same family and household, and boarded and lodged with them; that at the time of his death he was 18 years of age, and his brother Gordon was 20 years of age; that during that year he contributed to the support of his mother the sum of $1,218.30 as aforesaid, and that this included the expenses of his own board and lodging and $30 for his own clothing. It will be observed that the Commission made no deduction for the expenses of his clothing, board, and lodging. Its theory was that the language of the act authorizes an allowance in such cases, not only for the amount devoted to the support of the person who is partially dependent upon the minor child, but also for the amount which such minor child contributes to the dependent person to be applied to his own support. The argument in support of this theory appears to be that the mother is primarily chargeable with the support of her minor children, and that a contribution which one of those minor children makes to the support of himself and the mother is, in the contemplation of the law, money devoted to the support of the mother, as the statute expresses it. We can see no reason for such a construction of the statute. The language is plain, and it limits the measure of the amount of the award "to the annual amount devoted by the deceased to the support of the person or persons so partially dependent." Money which goes to the support of the deceased himself is, of course, not devoted to the support of any other person. The award is not made to the mother because of the fact that she is primarily responsible for the support of the minor children. The purpose of the act is to provide a compensation to the dependent person for the loss such person will sustain because of the death of the decedent, necessarily a loss subsequent to the death, and not a loss of any thing acquired before death. This loss, by the words of the act, is to be measured by the money previously devoted by the decedent to the support of the dependent. This implies that the loss to be compensated for does not include loss of the society, love or affection of the decedent, but that it is to be confined to the loss of support from the decedent. There could be no loss of the latter character after such death, on account of the money previously devoted to providing clothing, board, and lodging for the decedent himself, and supplied by the decedent to the general family chest. It follows that in determining the annual amount devoted to the support of the dependent mother, the amount of the general family expense paid by the decedent should be diminished by deducting the fair proportion thereof that went to the support of the decedent and to others in the family who were not dependent upon him. Everything should be excluded therefrom except the amount of his contributions that was devoted to the support of the dependent. The Commission appears to have been induced to adopt its theory on the authority of the decision in Re Gove, 223 Mass. 187, 111 N. E. 702, which holds to a similar theory of compensation under the Massachusetts Compensation Act (St. 1911, c. 751 as amended by St. 1912, c. 571). There is, however, a marked difference between the language of that act and the language of the statute of California on the subject, and it is precisely this difference which caused the decision in Massachusetts. The Massachusetts act makes the measure of the compensation dependent upon "the amount contributed by the employee to such partial dependents." The Massachusetts court construed this to mean all amounts contributed by the deceased to the dependent, regardless of the purpose to which it was applied, and thereupon it concluded that where the deceased was a minor and the dependent person was his parent with whom the deceased lived, the amount of his contribution going to the support of the deceased himself was not to be a deduction from the total contribution to the dependents. This was a fairly logical conclusion from the language of the Massachusetts act, but it cannot be taken as authority for the conclusion that the California act has the same effect. The language of our law, in cases of partial dependency, points to exactly the opposite conclusion, and limits the measure of the award to three times the annual amount devoted to the support of the dependent. This, of course, could not include any amount devoted to the support of some other person, or to the support of the decedent himself while living with the dependent as a member of the family.

The award is annulled, and the Commission is directed to proceed to an award in conformity with the views expressed in this opinion.

EISENMAYER v. THOMPSON. (L. A. 6702.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 28, 1921.)

1. Executors and administrators ⟹194(6)— Setting aside estate to widow is not open to collateral attack.

A judgment of the probate court setting aside the estate of a decedent to the widow under Code Civ. Proc. § 1469, which on its face vested absolute title to the property in the widow, is not open to collateral attack, but can only be questioned by direct attack.

2. Executors and administrators ⟹194(6)— Allegations of fraud in procuring judgment held insufficient.

In an action to quiet title based on a judgment setting aside realty to the widow of deceased owner, an answer alleging that the plaintiff fraudulently, with intent to deceive the court, misrepresented the value of the property, is not a sufficient allegation of fraud to open the judgment to collateral attack or to admit testimony disputing the finding of the probate court as to its value.

3. Judgment ⟹443(1) — Not set aside for fraud involved in action.

A court of equity will annul a judgment for fraud only where the fraud is extrinsic or collateral to the matter tried by court, and will not grant the relief for fraud involved in the merits of the action or in any matter on which decree was rendered.

4. Executors and administrators ⟹199—Evidence held not to show fraud in obtaining judgment setting property aside to widow.

In an action to quiet title for property set aside to a widow, evidence that the widow had estimated the value of the property in making her homestead declaration at $5,000, and stated in her petition for administration it did not exceed $5,000, with expert testimony the property was worth $4,500, does not show fraud by the widow in petitioning to have the property set off to her, and alleging that its value was $2,800, which was the value placed upon it by the appraisers.

5. Executors and administrators ⟹181 — Wife's declaration of homestead does not affect her right to have property set aside to her.

The right of a widow to have set aside to her the separate property of her husband where his estate was less than $1,500 in value, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1469, is not affected by the fact that the wife alone had made a declaration of homestead affecting the property before her husband's death.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Gavin W. Craig, Judge.

Action by Marcy K. Eisenmayer against W. K. Thompson, to quiet title to real estate. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Sidney J. Parsons, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Porter & Sutton, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

SLOANE, J. The plaintiff, claiming under a decree of the probate court assigning to her the property in question under the provisions of section 1469 of the Code of Civil Procedure, brings this action to quiet her title against the defendant, adversely claiming as a creditor of the estate of plaintiff's deceased husband.

It is conceded that decedent, George F. Eisenmayer, plaintiff's husband, died seized of title in fee to lot 13, block 15, of Montecito Park, in the county of Los Angeles, with the dwelling house thereon occupied by himself and wife as the family residence. The defendant, W. K. Thompson, pending the administration of said estate, in an action against the administratrix, obtained a judgment against the estate payable in due course of administration for upwards of $50,000. Thereafter, in due course of the administration of the estate, an inventory and appraisement was returned and filed showing the entire estate to consist of $193 in money and this real property, appraised at $2,800, making a total of $2,993. This valuation was subject to a mortgage of $1,900 on the real property, reducing the net value of the estate on the basis of the appraisement to less than $1,500, to wit, $890.

Proceedings were thereupon had in which these facts were set out by petition and this property was assigned to the widow, the plaintiff in this action, in conformity with the provisions of section 1469, supra.

The only pretense of any irregularity in the proceedings on the face of the record is that in the notice of the hearing of the application the blanks for the date on which the order to show cause thereon referred to was made were not filled out, and the order to show cause, which was dated August 2, 1919, was marked filed August 1st. These, of course, are inconsequential errors on a collateral attack.

The order of assignment itself recites the filing of the petition, order to show cause, notice of hearing, and the finding of the court that the net value of the whole estate does not exceed the sum of $1,500, and that all expenses of last illness, funeral charges and expenses of administration have been paid, and it is thereupon ordered, adjudged, and decreed that the whole of said estate "be and the same is hereby assigned to and the title thereof shall vest absolutely in Mary K. Eisenmayer, widow of said deceased," subject to mortgages, liens, or incumbrances existing at time of death of decedent. This judgment became final without any attempt to review it by either motion or appeal.

The ground of attack, which respondent presents with apparent seriousness, is, under the allegation of his answer, that, notwithstanding the finding and judgment of the court that the value of this estate was less than $1,500, it was in reality of greater value, and that the land in controversy was reasonably worth the sum of $4,500 at the time the order of the court was made, or $2,600 after deducting the mortgage, and that plaintiff "fraudulently and with intent to deceive said superior court falsely misrepresented the value of said real property."

On the trial the defendant was permitted, over the objection of plaintiff, to introduce evidence disputing the order and decree of the probate court as to value. The plaintiff was placed on the stand and admitted that she had placed an estimated value of $4,500 on the property in a declaration of homestead filed by her on the premises more than a year prior to the decree in the probate proceedings, and that in her petition for letters of administration it was recited that the value of the estate "did not exceed $5,000." Two other witnesses testified, over the objections of plaintiff, that in their opinion the market value of the real property was $4,500 or $5,000 at the time of the probate assignment.

On this evidence the trial court found that the plaintiff was not and never had been the owner of this real property; that the net value of the estate of the decedent on the 6th day of October, 1919, at the time of the order, was over the sum of $1,500, to wit, of the value of $2,500 and gave judgment for the defendant. This judgment was unauthorized by either the pleadings or the evidence.

[1] Under section 1469 of the Code of Civil Procedure the order of the probate court on its face vested absolute title to this property in the plaintiff. This judgment became final and conclusive, and not open to collateral attack. Dennis v. Winter, 63 Cal. 16, 18; Dungan v. Sup. Ct., 149 Cal. 98, 84 Pac. 767, 117 Am. St. Rep. 119; Luscomb v. Fintzelberg, 162 Cal. 433, 123 Pac. 247.

The conclusiveness of this order could only be questioned by a direct attack for fraud, extrinsic or collateral, to the issues tried. It could not be collaterally attacked merely for false testimony on the hearing as to its value.

[2] Fraud, if it could be raised at all by answer, must at least be pleaded with the particularity required in an equitable action to vacate the order. The only averment in the answer sounding in fraud was the allegation that—

"The plaintiff fraudulently, and with intent to deceive said superior court, falsely misrepresented the value of said real property, to wit, represented that the value of such real property, after deducting the balance of $1,900 due on the trust deed for $2,250 against said real property, was of the value of only $890, whereas in truth and in fact said property was of the value of $4,500, and said estate, after deducting the balance due on said trust deed as aforesaid, was of a value in excess of $2,500."

This was not a sufficient allegation of fraud to open the judgment to collateral attack or to admit testimony disputing the finding of the probate court as to the value of the property.

[3] A court of equity will only set aside or annul a judgment for fraud where the fraud is extrinsic or collateral to the matter tried by the court, and will not grant relief for fraud involved in the merits of the action or in any matter on which the decree was rendered, and a pleading based upon such intrinsic matter does not state a cause of action or a defense. Fealey v. Fealey, 104 Cal. 354, 38 Pac. 49, 43 Am. St. Rep. 111; Hanley v. Hanley, 114 Cal. 690, 46 Pac. 736; Bancroft v. Bancroft, 178 Cal. 359, 173 Pac. 579, L. R. A. 1918F, 1029.

Even on an appeal by a creditor from an order under section 1469, Code of Civil Procedure, claiming the value of the property to be greatly in excess of that stated, this court has said:

"Admitting that the court below could, if it had been imposed upon by a false inventory and appraisement, or by false testimony on the hearing, have set aside the decree, * * * we see no ground for doubting the correctness of the ruling. * * * The statute has confided to the appraisers in the first instance, and to the court in the second instance, the duty of ascertaining and fixing the value; and the reasonable and proper exercise of this judgment cannot be interfered with." Est. of Palomares, 63 Cal. 402.

[4] The court in this action makes no finding that there was any fraud or bad faith, and the evidence admitted at the trial would not justify such a finding.

It does not appear that the plaintiff here testified on the probate hearing, and her petition to have the property set apart to her, in which she alleges the value of the estate to be less than $1,500, recites and is predicated upon the appraisement fixing the value of the entire estate at $2,993 before deducting the $1,900 mortgage lien. It does not appear that she did not in good faith accept such appraisement as the fair valuation of the property. Her estimate of $4,500 as the value of the real estate in her homestead declaration a year previously does not reflect upon the correctness or good faith of her verified petition in the probate proceedings, in view of the fact that the homestead law permitted a declaration on property to the value of

$5,000, and only requires an estimated value to be placed in the declaration. Her only other reference to the valuation of this property was the statement in the petition for letters of administration that the property of the estate "did not exceed $5,000 in value."

In view of the fact that three disinterested appraisers and the probate court fixed the value at less than $1,500, the mere circumstance that witnesses at the trial of the present action had a different opinion, and fixed the value at $4,500, cannot be taken to show fraud on the part of this plaintiff, or to destroy her right in equity to have her title quieted.

[5] The declaration of homestead was introduced on this trial apparently as a muniment of title in plaintiff's behalf. The property was the separate estate of decedent, and the declaration of homestead was by the wife alone. It neither added to nor subtracted from her right to have the entire estate assigned to her under section 1469 of the Code of Civil Procedure. Estate of Neff, 139 Cal. 71, 72 Pac. 632.

The judgment is reversed.

MONTGOMERY v. MEYERSTEIN et al. (S. F. 9227, 9271.)

1. Vendor and purchaser ⟸341(1½)—Incumbrancers joining in contract held not personally liable to return purchase money after rescission for vendor's fraud.

Where the grantee of a trust deed and the beneficiary thereunder joined in the contract for the sale of the property to plaintiff at plaintiff's request, but had no interest therein except to receive the payment of the debt secured by the trust deed by plaintiff, they are not personally liable to plaintiff for the amount paid on the secured debt after plaintiff rescinded her contract for the fraud of the vendor in which the incumbrancers did not participate.

2. Mortgages ⟸209, 298(4)—After payment of debt conveyance from trustee is only necessary to perfect record title.

Under Civ. Code, §§ 871, 2279, the estate of a trustee, under a trust deed to secure a debt, absolutely ceases upon the payment of the debt, and the only purpose to be served by having the trustee join in conveyance of the property after payment of the debt would be to make the record title clear.

3. Vendor and purchaser ⟸337—Statute giving lien for purchase money after failure of consideration does not exclude other liens.

Civ. Code, § 3050, giving a lien for the purchase money paid for land where there is a failure of consideration, was not intended to be exclusive, and to abrogate previously established rules of equity on the subject, and does not prevent a lien for the purchase money paid after the purchaser rescinds for the vendor's fraud.

4. Vendor and purchaser ⟸337 — Purchaser has lien after rescission for vendor's fraud.

A purchaser of realty who rescinds a contract for the vendor's fraud is entitled to a lien on the property for the portion of the purchase price paid before the rescission.

5. Vendor and purchaser ⟸341(5)—Purchaser rescinding for fraud should account for value of use.

A purchaser who took possession of the property and made payments and improvements thereon, and thereafter rescinded on discovering the vendor's fraud, and sued to recover the payments and cost of improvements, should account to the vendor for the value of the use of the premises.

6. Vendor and purchaser ⟸36(1)—Fact that property was worth amount paid does not prevent rescission for fraud.

The fact that the property was worth the amount which the purchaser paid for it does not bar the purchaser's right to rescind the contract for fraudulent misrepresentations if the property was not worth as much as it would have been had the representations been true.

7. Vendor and purchaser ⟸119 — Purchaser held not guilty of laches in rescinding for fraud.

Where vendor represented that he had paid more for the house than he actually did, and exhibited the contract, which had been padded to support such misrepresentation, the fact that the purchaser had seen the contract and knew the name of the contractor did not put her on inquiry to discover the misrepresentation, but rather tended to lull her into security, so that she was not guilty of laches in not rescinding until after discovering the fraud.

8. Mortgages ⟸151(1)—Lien for return of purchase money is subject to prior trust deed.

The lien of the purchaser for the purchase money paid after rescission by her for the vendor's misrepresentation is subject to the lien of a trust deed and mortgage against the property at the time the contract was made.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action by May Montgomery against Alfred L. Meyerstein and others, to rescind a contract. From a judgment awarding rescission of the contract, but giving plaintiff judgment for refund of the purchase price paid, and expenses only against defendant Otto A. Brown, and refusing to make the judgment a lien against the property, and from an order denying plaintiff's motion for additional judgment under the findings, plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded, with instructions.

Ornbaun & Fraser, of San Francisco (Cleveland R. Wright, of San Francisco, of counsel), for appellant.

Walter H. Linforth, of San Francisco, for respondents.

SHAW, J. The complaint states a cause of action in favor of the plaintiff against the defendants to recover of the defendants the sum of $2,020 upon the rescission of a contract for the conveyance of a certain lot executed by the defendants to the plaintiff. The money sought to be recovered consists of $500 paid by plaintiff to defendant Brown, and $1,170 paid by her to defendant Forest Hill Realty Company, both sums being paid as part of the purchase price of said property, and several sums paid upon the property, the items being $215 for improvements upon the property, $10 for a defective door in a house erected on the property by the defendants, $75 for taxes, and $50 for insurance on the property. The ground upon which the rescission was claimed was the false and fraudulent representations of the defendants to the plaintiff concerning the property which induced her to enter into the agreement of purchase. The complaint also asks that the plaintiff be given a lien upon the property for the above-stated amounts.

Issues were taken upon the material allegations of the complaint, the cause was tried by the court, and findings were made and judgment rendered in favor of the plaintiff against the defendant Brown alone for the recovery of $2,020, being the total amount demanded in the complaint as aforesaid, but without declaring any lien upon the property, and in favor of the other defendants against the plaintiff for their costs. Thereafter the plaintiff moved the court, under section 663 of the Code of Civil Procedure, to enter a judgment on the findings for $1,170 against the Forest Hill Realty Company, and for a lien upon the property contracted to be sold by defendants to the plaintiff for the amount due her from the Forest Hill Realty Company and Brown. This motion was denied. Plaintiff has appealed from the judgment, and also from the order denying the said motion. The appeals were taken separately and separate transcripts were filed. The appeal from the judgment is numbered 9227, and that from the order denying the motion is numbered 9271. As the same questions are presented by both appeals it is unnecessary to distinguish between them in the opinion.

The facts stated in the findings are as follows: On September 23, 1915, while Brown was the owner of the land sold to the plaintiff, he executed to defendant Meyerstein a deed of trust of said land to secure the payment of $2,125 then owing by him to defendant Forest Hill Realty Company. The property was also then subject to a prior lien executed by Brown to the Bank of Italy to secure the payment of $3,500 owing by him to said bank. The agreement of sale between the defendants and the plaintiff was executed on February 7, 1916. The negotiations were conducted by Brown alone, and the representations complained of were made by him alone. Neither of the other defendants had any part therein, and had no knowledge thereof at the time they executed the agreement, or afterwards, so far as appears, until this suit was begun. While the negotiations for the agreement of sale were pending the plaintiff learned of the fact that the property was incumbered by the deed of trust and mortgage aforesaid. Because of this fact, and for no other reason, plaintiff requested that the two other defendants, Meyerstein, the trustee, and Forest Hill Realty Company, the beneficiary under the deed of trust, join in the execution of the agreement, and they did so. She knew that they had no right or title to the property, and she fully understood that she was not buying the property from them, but was purchasing it from Brown.

The agreement for the sale fixed the price of the property at $7,630, of which $500 was paid to Brown upon its execution. The balance of the price was to be paid in installments of $65 per month, with interest at 6 per cent. per annum, to the Forest Hill Realty Company, until the entire sum was paid. The opening paragraph named the three defendants as "parties of the first part." Thereafter, in describing the parties, the phrase used is "party of the first part." It provides that upon full payment "the party of the first part" will execute to the plaintiff a deed conveying title to her free and clear of all incumbrances. The false representation by which plaintiff was induced to execute the agreement was made by Brown, and was to the effect that the house then on the premises had cost $5,000, and to establish that fact to her satisfaction he exhibited to her the contract between himself and the contractor who erected the same, which stated that the contract price was $5,000. The fact was that the contract price was only $4,100, and the court found that the written contract therefor was "padded to the amount of $900 for the express purpose of making the buyer believe that the house cost $5,000." The plaintiff would not have purchased the property had it not been for such fraudulent representation, and she believed it to be true.

She immediately took possession of the property, and thereupon proceeded to make the monthly payments to the Forest Hill Realty Company until she had paid it the sum of $1,170. After taking possession she expended $215 for improvements, consisting of a fence on the property and some stairs and hardwood floors in the house, $10 paid on account of a defective door, $75 for taxes, and $50 for an insurance premium on the house, making the total payment $2,020. The plaintiff first learned of the fact that the said representation as to the cost of the house was false and fraudulent on September 22, 1917. She immediately demanded the return of the money she had paid upon the contract and for the expenditures thereon as aforesaid, and offered to restore what she had received under the contract. Thereupon she began this action.

[1] We find no merit in the claim of the plaintiff that the Forest Hill Realty Company and Meyerstein are liable for the money paid by plaintiff on the agreement, and for the improvements made and for taxes and insurance, because of the fact that they are parties to the agreement of purchase. The facts found clearly show that they had no interest in the purchase other than the fact that they held the incumbrance upon the property by virtue of the deed of trust and the obligation of Brown. It was the plaintiff herself who requested them to sign the agreement, and it is obvious that her object was to protect herself against the contingency that the incumbrances aforesaid might not be paid if the payments were made to Brown. The payments made did not fully satisfy the claim of the Forest Hill Realty Company under the deed of trust. Neither that company nor Meyerstein had any knowledge whatever of the fraud of Brown in procuring the agreement to be executed. They were innocent participants in the agreement, and they were entitled to the money upon the preceding obligation of Brown to the Realty Company. They are not responsible for Brown's fraud, and the only recourse of the plaintiff was against Brown alone. As the money they received was owing to them prior to the execution of the agreement they cannot be charged with having received it by reason of the fraud, nor can it be held Brown was their agent in procuring the agreement by means of the fraudulent representations so as to make them responsible for the return of the money.

[2] While the agreement on its face appears to be the agreement of all three of the parties of the first part, it is obvious from the facts that the other two parties had no interest in the transaction except so far as they had a lien upon the property to be satisfied out of the purchase money. The obligation to convey the property would bind them to join in the conveyance upon full payment of the price, if any part of the incumbrance they held remained unpaid or undischarged at that time. The estate of Meyerstein under his deed would absolutely cease upon the payment of the debt of Brown to the realty company (Civ. Code, §§ 871, 2279), and the only purpose to be served thereafter by having Meyerstein join in the conveyance would have been to make the record title clear. McLeod v. Moran, 153 Cal. 100, 94 Pac. 604. Under these circumstances we are of the opinion that no personal obligation for the return of the money paid on the price or expended upon the property was created by the rescission of the contract for the fraud of Brown.

[3] We are further of the opinion that under the facts in this case the plaintiff was entitled to a lien upon the lot for the amount of the purchase money paid by her and the expenditures she made upon the property, including the taxes and insurance. The claim of the defendants in this behalf is that, under section 3050 of the Civil Code, the right to a lien for the purchase money paid is limited to cases where there is a failure of consideration, and does not extend to cases where the contract is properly rescinded by the vendee on the ground that fraudulent representations of the vendor induced the execution of the contract. We do not understand that section 3050 was intended to be exclusive and to abrogate the previously established rules of equity on the subject. It contains no language to that effect, and we can perceive no reason why it should be so interpreted.

[4] The reasons for the rule which gives the vendee the right to rescind upon the failure of the vendor to execute the contract, or the avoidance thereof for any reason, and to a lien upon the land, applies as forcibly to cases of rescission for fraud as to cases of failure of consideration, and are thus clearly stated by the English court of Chancery in Rose v. Watson, 10 H. C. L. 672, 11 Eng. Reprint, 1190:

"When the owner of an estate contracts with a purchaser for the immediate sale of it, the ownership of the estate is, in equity, transferred by that contract. * * * Every portion of the purchase money paid in pursuance of that contract is a part performance and execution of the contract, and, to the extent of the purchase money so paid, does, in equity, finally transfer to the purchaser the ownership of a corresponding portion of the estate. * * * In conformity, therefore, with every principle, the purchaser paying the money acquired an interest in the estate by force of the contract and of that part performance of the contract, namely, the payment of that portion of the purchase money."

And thereupon the court adjudged that the vendee was entitled to a lien upon the property for the purchase money paid.

See, also, 2 Sugden on Vendors, 672.

The doctrine is also stated as follows:

"If the contract fails, or is avoided, because of the inability or refusal of the vendor to make a proper title, or because of fraud or misrepresentation in the contract, or for any other reason chargeable to the vendor, and which is not due to the default of the vendee, he is given a lien upon the land as security for the repayment of what he has paid in performance of the contract." 29 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law 730; 39 Cyc. 2032. (The italics are ours.)

"The lien also exists to secure the vendee any amount to which he is entitled for having erected improvements upon the land." 29 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law, 730; 39 Cyc. 2037.

It also extends to expenditures for taxes and insurance. 2 Black on Rescission, § 694. Many cases are cited to the proposition stated in these authorities, and they fully support the text. It is unnecessary to cite them here.

[5] Perhaps it should be stated as a complete exposition of the doctrine that the vendee who has been in possession should, upon claiming such rescission and lien for the purchase money paid, account for the value of the use of the property during the time he has been in possession. This being an appeal by the plaintiff for an additional judgment giving a lien for the purchase money and expenditures, and the defendants having made no claim for such rentals in their pleadings, the question does not arise upon this appeal, and it is not presented in the briefs.

[6] The respondents claim that the court below was in error in adjudging that the plaintiff had a right to rescind. The argument is that the findings predicate the right to rescind solely upon the fact that Brown made false statements concerning the contract price of building the house upon the premises, and that it is not stated in the findings that the property was not worth the full amount of the price agreed upon. The case comes up upon the judgment roll alone, and the evidence is not shown. It is well settled that in a case of fraud the fact that the property was worth as much as the price agreed upon does not prevent the right of rescission if it appears that it would have been worth more if the representations which procured it had been true. Spreckels v. Gorrill, 152 Cal. 389, 92 Pac. 1011; Davis v. Butler, 154 Cal. 627, 98 Pac. 1047.

[7] There is no merit in the objection that the plaintiff was guilty of laches in not making her offer to rescind sooner. The findings show that she did not discover the falsity of the representation until about one month prior to the beginning of the action. The fact that she was informed of the name of the contractor and inspected the contract itself was not sufficient to put her upon inquiry as to the truth of the statement. On the contrary, its tendency was to lull her into security regarding it.

[8] It is necessary to add that the lien to which the plaintiff is entitled, to secure the return of the money she has paid on the price and expended on the property is subject to the lien of the Forest Hill Realty Company for the remainder of the debt secured to it by the deed of trust to Meyerstein, and also subject to the prior mortgage to the Bank of Italy. The decree to be rendered upon the going down of the remittitur should so declare. The court should have granted the motion to enter a different judgment with respect to the lien claimed for the amount of expenditures made, but subject to the aforesaid prior liens. If correctly refused to enter personal judgment against the Forest Hill Realty Company for $1,170 paid to it upon the purchase price.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to enter judgment in favor of the plaintiff against Brown for the sum of $2,020, with interest to the date of such entry, and declaring a lien therefor upon the property described in the complaint, subject to the liens of the Forest Hill Realty Company and the Bank of Italy aforesaid.

(Supreme Court of California. July 26, 1921. Rehearing Denied August 25, 1921.)

1. Highways ⟸184(2)—Evidence held to sustain verdict finding plaintiff's rear lamp was lighted.

In an action for injuries sustained in an automobile collision, testimony by plaintiff that he had lighted his rear light, and by the driver of the car which he passed just before the accident that the rear light was burning, is sufficient to sustain a verdict finding plaintiff's automobile carried a lighted rear light as required by statute.

2. Highways ⟸184(2)—Defendant has burden of proving defect in plaintiff's light, unless it appeared from plaintiff's evidence.

Since contributory negligence is an affirmative defense, the burden of proving which is on the defendant, defendant cannot rely on the insufficiency of plaintiff's rear light to be visible at a distance of 500 feet, where such insufficiency did not appear from plaintiff's evidence, and defendant introduced no evidence to establish it.

3. Highways ⟸184(4) — Defendant cannot complain of instruction omitting requirement as to plaintiff's rear light, in absence of evidence showing defect.

Where there was no evidence in the case as to whether plaintiff's rear light complied with the requirement of Motor Vehicle Law, § 13, that it shall illuminate the number on the vehicle, defendant cannot complain that the court failed to instruct the jury as to such requirement, since, if the failure to comply with that requirement was negligence contributing to the accident, the burden was on defendant to prove it.

Department 1.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Action by John F. Hollowell and wife against Adrien E. Cameron to recover damages for personal injuries and for damage to an automobile. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. I. Gilbert, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Brinton Gregory and Fred W. Morrison, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

LAWLOR, J. The plaintiffs, husband and wife, brought this action against the defendant for damages for personal injuries received by them in an automobile collision and for injury to the machine in which they were riding. The case was tried by jury, and judgment was entered upon a verdict in favor of plaintiffs. The defendant appeals.

About 8 o'clock on the evening of July 1, 1917, respondents were riding in their Ford automobile along Avenue 64, between Los Angeles and Pasadena, and with them was their 15 months old grandson. Mr. Hollowell was driving, and the machine was traveling at a rate of about 20 miles an hour. He drove to one side to pass another machine, driven by one William Clark Houston, and had just swung back to the right side of the road, when appellant, in a Stutz car, came up from behind and crashed into the rear end of the Ford. The Ford was overturned and damaged, and respondents were both injured; Mrs. Hollowell being thrown through the top of the car. The baby escaped injury. Mr. Houston testified:

"I saw Mr. Cameron before I got to the accident; he passed me also. I did hear a noise coming before he reached me. I heard a terrific blowing of the horn. * * * He was going 50 miles an hour, if he was going a mile."

Henry W. Baker testified:

"No; I do not know how fast he was driving. * * * I saw he was driving at a terrible rate of speed."

Appellant testified:

"I was driving around 30 miles an hour, but not in excess of 30."

Appellant bases his claim for reversal upon three contentions—(1) insufficiency of the evidence to justify the verdict; (2) that the verdict is against the law and the evidence; and (3) that certain instructions were erroneous.

[1] 1. First as to the sufficiency of the evidence. We quote from appellant's brief:

"The entire testimony of both plaintiff and defendant centered around the light on the rear of the machine of the plaintiff. Witnesses for the plaintiff testified that he did have a tail light on the automobile; but a search of the record will not disclose that any witness for the plaintiff testified that he had a tail light on his Ford visible for 500 feet in the rear, as the law requires."

Respondent testified in part as follows:

"Q. The front lights you can light from the inside of the car? A. Yes, sir. Q. The tail light, you have to get out? A. I would like to make a statement about when I lighted the tail light. Q. When did you light the tail light? A. On Fremont street, about 100 feet from Third street, near the Friends' Church, here in Los Angeles. Q. At what time of night or day? A. 7:45, or a quarter to 8. I know that, because I looked at my watch at that time. Q. How did you happen to look at your watch then? A. Because I had not taken the time of day, and that is how I happen to. * * * It was 7:45. * * * The tail light was in good condition, because I had cleaned it and put oil in that morning."

William Clark Houston testified:

"He [Mr. Hollowell] did drive over onto the right-hand side of the road when he passed me. His tail light was lit at that time," and that "I saw the tail light on the Ford, and it was lighted."

It follows that the implied finding of the jury that the Ford carried a lighted tail light is supported by the evidence.

[2] Next, as to the claim that no witness for respondents testified that the tail light was visible for 500 feet to the rear. It is true that neither the transcript nor the briefs contain any such evidence. But the burden of proving contributory negligence was upon appellant. In Schneider v. Market St. Ry. Co., 134 Cal. 482, 66 Pac. 734, it was said:

"It remains to consider the question of alleged contributory negligence on the part of the plaintiff's decedent. In considering this, it is important to bear in mind that such negligence is a matter of defense, to be proved affirmatively by the defendant, and hence that the burden of proof is on him [citing cases]. 'In this state * * * it is sufficient for the plaintiff to show, in the first instance, that the injury resulted from the negligence of the defendant.' Smith v. Occidental S. S. Co., 99 Cal. 468. And see also Shearman & Redfield on Negligence, §§ 107–109, there cited. * * * It must also appear affirmatively, in the same conclusive way, that the negligence of the plaintiff was, in whole or in part, the proximate cause of the injury, or in other words, that it contributed to that effect. Smith v. Occidental, etc., Steamship Co., 99 Cal. 468."

In Gay v. Winter, 34 Cal. 153, the court declared:

"In the absence of any direct proof, we are of the opinion that the jury are at liberty to infer ordinary care and diligence on the part of the plaintiff from all the circumstances of the case—his character and habits and the natural instinct of self-preservation. To hold otherwise would be in effect to presume negligence on the part of one in excuse of negligence on the part of another."

In McDougall v. Central R. R. Co., 63 Cal. 431, the court said:

"Of course, the circumstances, as related by the plaintiff's witnesses, will often satisfy the court or jury that plaintiff has been guilty of such contributory negligence as will prohibit a recovery."

The jury was repeatedly instructed that, if the tail light on the Ford was not lighted, or if it did not have a light plainly visible for 500 feet to the rear, then respondent was guilty of negligence. It is clear that the evidence offered by respondent does not tend to establish contributory negligence, and that it was sufficient to justify the jury in finding that the proximate cause of the accident was the negligence of appellant in driving the Stutz car at an excessive rate of speed. Hence it devolved upon appellant to prove affirmatively that the red light was not visible 500 feet to the rear, and, having failed to do so, he will not be heard to charge the omission of the proof to respondents.

2. In view of what we have already said, the contention of appellant that "the verdict is against the law and the evidence" must be held to be without merit.

[3] 3. Appellant's final contention is that—

"The court charged the jury that certain acts of the defendant might or might not constitute negligence, and named the elements mentioned in the statute; but in charging the negligence which rested upon the plaintiff (and the negligence of both the plaintiff and defendant is created entirely by statute in so far as this case is concerned), we find the court leaves out one of the essential elements in so far as plaintiff is concerned, to wit, that of placing a light of such character and description that its strength might not only be tested by the red light shining 500 feet in the rear, but by the white light which must display the numbers for a distance of at least 50 feet to the rear."

Appellant bases this contention on the provisions of the Motor Vehicle Act (section 13, p. 405, Stats. 1915), to the effect that the tail lamp shall exhibit a red light plainly visible for a distance of 500 feet toward the rear—

"and so constructed and placed that the number plate carried on the rear of such motor vehicle shall be illuminated by a white light in such manner that the number thereon can be plainly distinguished * * * at a distance of not less than fifty feet toward the rear."

The court charged the jury that if the Ford did not have a tail light visible 500 feet in the rear, or if he did have and it was not lighted, respondent was guilty of negligence, and that such negligence proximately contributed to the injury. In connection with this point appellant assigns error to the refusal of the court to give an instruction to the effect that a failure to carry a tail light which would comply with the double requirement of exhibiting a red light visible 500 feet to the rear, and a white light illuminating the number plate to make it visible 50 feet to the rear, would be contributory negligence. We do not understand appellant to complain of the instructions concerning the red light. Respondent's answer to these contentions is that, even if the tail light was not so constructed and placed with reference to the number, this was not the proximate cause of the accident, and that, in addition, there is no testimony that the light was not so constructed and placed. It is true the instruction given does not specifically refer to the white light. But, as we have shown, the burden of proving contributory negligence was on appellant, and we cannot find any evidence as to whether or not the tail light was so constructed and placed as to show the number, or that it did not show the number on this occasion.

Judgment affirmed.

MILLER et al. v. SUPERIOR COURT OF YOLO COUNTY et al. (Sac. 3263.)

1. Courts ⊜475(2, 3) — Application for general administration deprives other courts of jurisdiction during its pendency.

Under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1294, 1295, providing for issuance of letters testamentary or administration, a petition looking to the appointment of an executor or general administrator in one court vests that court with exclusive jurisdiction thereof until the petition is finally disposed of, so that a petition for similar letters in any other court is beyond the jurisdiction of that court.

2. Courts ⊜475(2, 3) — Special administrator may be appointed while application for general administration is pending in another court.

A special administrator, who is purely an emergency officer to preserve the property until the appointment of a general administrator, and from whose appointment no appeal will lie, under Code Civ. Proc. §§ 1411, 1417, may be appointed by a court of the county in which the property of the estate is situated, while proceedings for the issuance of general letters of administration or letters testamentary are pending in another county.

3. Courts ⊜475(2, 3) — Application for special administrator does not deprive other courts of jurisdiction to appoint such administrator.

A pending application for the appointment of a special administrator to preserve property does not deprive other courts, in counties where some property of deceased was situated, from entertaining an application for the appointment of such special administrator while the proceedings were still pending in the other county.

In Bank.

Application by Gant D. Miller and another, in the District Court of Appeal, for writ of prohibition against the Superior Court of the County of Yolo, and the Judge thereof, to restrain further action in connection with special administration. Writ discharged, and proceeding dismissed.

Sullivan & Sullivan and Theo. J. Roche, of San Francisco, for plaintiffs.

Sanborn & Roehl and De Lancey C. Smith, all of San Francisco, for defendants.

Dozier & Dozier, of San Francisco, amici curiæ.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. In this matter, originally commenced in the District Court of Appeal of the First Appellate District, Division One, an alternative writ of prohibition was issued restraining defendants from proceeding further in the matter of the estate of one Francis M. Miller, deceased, and subsequently a peremptory writ was ordered issued. Upon petition to this court, this decision was vacated, and a hearing ordered herein.

The only action on the part of respondents relative to the estate of Francis M. Miller is the appointment by the Yolo county superior court on February 14, 1921, of one Cora White as special administratrix of the estate of deceased, the qualification of said Cora White as such special administratrix, and the issuance to her of special letters of administration, and the institution by her as special administratrix in said superior court of an action against one J. H. Miller, to recover certain money alleged to belong to said deceased. It was not and is not suggested that respondents entertained or were threatening to entertain any proceeding looking or relating to the appointment of a general administrator or the general administration of the estate.

The claim of plaintiffs is that the Yolo county superior court was without jurisdiction to entertain any special administration proceeding or to appoint a special administrator solely by reason of the fact of the prior inauguration and pendency in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco of a proceeding for the probate of an authenticated copy of the will of deceased, and the issuance to plaintiffs, who are nonresidents, of letters testamentary thereon, and also the issuance to them pending such admission to probate of special letters of administration.

The deceased was a resident of and died testate in the state of West Virginia. His will was there regularly admitted to probate. It appointed plaintiffs executor and executrix, and they regularly qualified in West Virginia as such, and subsequently presented a duly authenticated copy of the will for probate in this state, filing their application in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco, alleging that deceased left property in such city and county. Their application was opposed by parties beneficially interested in the estate. Pending determination of this contest in the San Francisco superior court the Yolo county application for special letters of administration was made, based upon sufficient allegations of property in Yolo county.

Prior to the hearing in this court the application for special letters in the San Francisco superior court was denied. The necessity for a special administrator pending the appointment of an executor or general administrator is not denied. Since the submission of the matter herein, it has been represented to us by a statement filed herein, served on plaintiffs, that since the oral argument and submission the San Francisco superior court has given judgment denying the application for the admission of the will to probate and the appointment of plaintiffs as executors, on the ground that deceased left no property in the city and county of San Francisco. This judgment, however, has not become final, and the pendency of the proceeding may be indefinitely protracted by an appeal.

[1] Our law provides that "wills must be proved, and letters testamentary or of administration granted: * * * 3. In the county in which any part of the estate may be, the decedent having died out of the state, and not resident thereof at the time of his death" (section 1294, Code Civ. Proc.) and that "when the estate of the decedent is in more than one county, he having died out of the state, and not having been a resident thereof at the time of his death, * * * the superior court of that county in which application is first made, for letters testamentary or of administration, has exclusive jurisdiction of the settlement of the estate," (section 1295, Code Civ. Proc). It is settled that, in view of this section, action by any other court than that in which a petition is first filed, looking to the appointment of an executor or general administrator or the settlement of the estate, is in excess of its jurisdiction during the pendency of the proceeding inaugurated by the filing of such petition. Dungan v. Superior Court, of Fresno County, 149 Cal. 98, 84 Pac. 767, 117 Am. St. Rep. 119. The situation in this respect is the same as when jurisdiction to grant letters of administration depends on the residence of a deceased resident of this state, in which case exclusive jurisdiction exists in the court of the county in which a petition for general letters is first filed, for so long as the proceeding thus inaugurated is pending. See Estate of Damke, 133 Cal. 430, 65 Pac. 889. The question here is whether this rule is applicable in the matter of special letters of administration.

[2] A special administrator is purely an emergency officer, appointed not to conduct the administration of the estate, but solely to conserve the property where necessary because of the absence of a qualified executor or general administrator. His powers are such generally "as may be necessary for the preservation of the estate," and he has nothing to do with the matter of general administration. Such an officer may be appointed "at any time, and without notice," and "when letters testamentary or of administration on the estate of the decedent have been granted" his powers cease, and he must account for and forthwith deliver to the executor or administrator all the property and effects of the decedent in his hands. It is expressly provided that no appeal lies from the order appointing him. Sections 1411 to 1417, Code Civ. Proc.

The whole theory as to such an officer is that it is essential in some cases to the preservation of the property of a deceased to have some regularly authorized person at once to gather together and hold and care for the property of the deceased pending the issuance of letters testamentary or general letters of administration. The obvious design was to provide for the immediate appointment and installation of such an officer, where necessary, who may exercise the limited powers essential to the protection of the property of the estate pending the delay incident to the installation of an executor or general administrator, and who may prevent loss or injury to the property in just such a situation as is here presented, where such installation may be indefinitely delayed pending final determination of the question of jurisdiction to grant letters testamentary or of general administration. In a sense the proceeding for the appointment of such an officer is separate from and independent of the general administration proceeding, and the court entertaining such a proceeding has jurisdiction only for the special purposes of that character of proceeding.

It was held in Estate of Damke, 133 Cal. 433, 65 Pac. 888, that the prior appointment of a special administrator by the court of one county in no degree affects the question of the determination of the question of jurisdiction of proceedings for the general administration of the estate, and that the latter question is left open for determination on an application for general letters entirely regardless of the prior grant of special letters. The same thing was held by the Supreme Court of Washington in Stern v. Sill, 39 Wash. 557, 81 Pac. 1007; where the distinction in this regard between special and general letters is noted. In both of these cases the validity of the grant of special letters was taken for granted, and in the latter case was expressly upheld. In both of these cases it is true that the grant of special letters was prior to the filing in the other county of a petition for general letters, but we think this is immaterial to the question here involved. The important thing is that the two kinds of proceeding are to such an extent so separate and distinct, and have such different purpose, that the mere pendency in one county of a proceeding looking to the appointment of an executor or general administrator, which may ultimately fail for want of showing of facts essential to jurisdiction, should not be held to operate as a limitation on the jurisdiction of the superior court of the other county to entertain and act upon an application for special letters, and that consequently the rule of Dungan v. Superior Court, 149 Cal. 98, 84 Pac. 767, 117 Am. St. Rep. 119, and Estate of Damke, 133 Cal. 430, 65 Pac. 889, as to the exclusive jurisdiction of the court in which the petition for general letters is first filed, has no proper application in so far as the appointment of a special administrator is concerned.

[3] Of course the law contemplates that an application for special letters shall be made only in a county the superior court of which has jurisdiction by reason of the jurisdictional facts essential to general administration in that county, such as residence of the deceased when a resident of the state, the presence of property in the county when a nonresident, etc. Section 1294, Code Civ. Proc. But for the purposes of special administration, the court to which the application is addressed must determine those matters solely for the purpose of such special administration. And we think the mere fact of the pendency of an ungranted application of the same character in another county should not be held to operate as a bar to such action. Doubtless, too, where occasion arises for the appointment of a special administrator after the county of general administration has been finally determined, the application must be to the proper court of that county. But we think that, under the circumstances of this case, the superior court of Yolo county, in which confessedly most of the property of the deceased is situate, did not exceed its jurisdiction in entertaining and acting upon the application for special letters of administration merely because of a pending application for general letters in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco.

The question upon which this court specially requested argument was as to the jurisdiction of the District Court of Appeal of one district to issue a writ of prohibition against the superior court of a county beyond the limits of its district. In view of the apparent necessity of deciding speedily the question we have discussed, in order that proper measures may be taken for the immediate conservation of the property of the estate pending the contest for general administration, we have devoted ourselves to the latter question, and in view of our conclusion thereon it is not necessary to consider the question of the jurisdiction of the District Court of Appeal.

The alternative writ of prohibition issued by the District Court of Appeal is discharged, and the proceeding is dismissed.

We concur: SLOANE, J.; LENNON, J.; LAWLOR, J.; SHURTLEFF, J.

SHAW, J. I concur. I wish to add another point. Section 1416 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides that the powers of the special administrator cease when letters testamentary or of general administration upon the estate are finally granted and that thereupon the special administrator "must forthwith deliver to the executor or administrator all the property and effects of the decedent in his hands." This provision would, of course, apply to every special administrator, regardless of the county in which his appointment was made. It is the equivalent to a statement that the special administrator must render an account to the executor or administrator of the estate. As the jurisdiction of the estate must thenceforward be in the superior court of the county by which the general letters are granted, it should follow that the superior court of that county must have jurisdiction to require such account of the special administrator, and to settle the same when it is rendered. In no other way can the affairs of the estate be assuredly settled without confusion and conflict of authority.

I concur; WILBUR, J.

COSGRAVE et al. v. DONOVAN et al.
(Civ. 2305.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 13, 1921.)

1. Boundaries ⟸46(1)—No agreed boundary, in absence of uncertainty.

There can be no agreed boundary line, in absence of uncertainty, and there could be no orally agreed boundary, where stakes of the original government survey were in place when the fence was constructed under agreement.

2. Boundaries ⟸37(5)—Proof held not sufficient to require finding of agreed boundary.

In a boundary dispute, proof produced held not so clear and certain as to require finding that a line was agreed upon.

3. Appeal and error ⟸1011(1)—Findings on conflicting evidence conclusive on appeal.

Finding of court on conflicting evidence is conclusive on appeal.

4. Boundaries ⟸46(2) — Agreement as to boundary not binding, on proof of an undivided interest.

An agreement as to correct boundary was not binding on one owning an undivided interest in one of the tracts of land, who was neither a party to the agreement nor gave her consent thereto.

5. Appeal and error ⟸1054(3)—Question to defendant as witness as to ill feeling harmless, if erroneous.

In a boundary dispute, tried to the court, it was harmless, if error, to permit question to defendant as a witness as to disagreement with and ill feeling toward a plaintiff, where the witness had testified to matters relative only to an alleged agreed line, which issue was necessarily determined against the appellants, and the court did not fix the location of the dividing lines other than by reference to the public land surveys; the evidence not furnishing the court with the necessary data to more definitely locate the line.

6. Quieting title ⟸51 — Both parties entitled to have ownerships adjudged.

In an action to quiet title, involving a boundary dispute, both parties were entitled to have their respective ownership adjudged.

7. Trial ⟸388(4)—Finding not necessary on admitted fact.

In an action to quiet title, where plaintiff's title to certain part of the land involved was not denied in the answer, no finding on the issue thus tendered was necessary.

Appeal from Superior Court, Calaveras County; S. A. Smith, Judge.

Action by Margaret Cosgrave and others against Kate Donovan and another. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiffs appeal. Modified and affirmed.

Application for transfer to Supreme Court denied. 199 Pac. 810.

Dave Cosgrave, of San Francisco, and Snyder & Snyder, of San Andreas, for appellants.

Virgil M. Airola, of San Andreas, for respondents.

FINCH, P. J. The plaintiffs sued to quiet their title to the southwest quarter of a section of land and to ascertain and adjudge the location of the eastern boundary line thereof. It is alleged that the plaintiffs and defendants together surveyed and laid out said boundary line; that the plaintiffs at large expense, and with the consent and acquiescence of the defendants, built a substantial fence on the line so fixed; and that said line is the true boundary line of said land. The defendants answer, setting up title to the southeast quarter of said section and other lands in defendant Kate Donovan, and denying the allegations of the complaint relative to the establishment of such boundary line. The court found for the defendants on the issue as to the boundary line, and the plaintiffs appeal from the judgment.

It appears that there was a public road running east and west through the north half of the south half of the section and crossing the common boundary line.

[1] 1. Plaintiffs endeavored to show that the boundary line was established by agreement between the predecessors in title of the plaintiffs and defendants. In the year 1880 Michael Cosgrave owned the southwest quarter of the section and David Maloney the southeast quarter. Near the center of the dividing line there was then "a little open space," called the "flat." To the north and the south of the "flat" there were "trees and rock." During that year Maloney caused to be plowed "a double furrow and a single furrow, a few feet apart." Maloney then told George Cosgrave, a son of Michael, that "he had produced a line and to keep the sheep on the west side of the line." About the year 1883, Michael Cosgrave built a fence on "the same line," and Maloney "furnished a part of the lumber to build it." George Cosgrave, the only witness who testified concerning the transaction, said he did not remember "any conversation at all." The fence thereafter remained as at first located and was used by both owners. This fence was about a quarter mile long, running south from the road. The land was surveyed by the United States in 1876. The testimony shows that the land was "staked" for several years; that the "stake" in the center of the section was in place for several years after the fence was built. It is plain that this evidence is insufficient to prove an agreed line. The "stakes" of the original survey locating the corners were in place when the fence was built, and hence there could have been no uncertainty at that time as to the location of the true line. The law applicable is well settled.

"The doctrine of an agreed boundary line and its binding effects upon the coterminous owners rest fundamentally upon the fact that there is, or is believed by all parties to be, an uncertainty as to the location of the true line. When that uncertainty exists, or is believed by them to exist, they may amongst themselves, by agreement, fix the boundary line, and that agreement will bind all the consenting parties. Acquiescence is merely evidence of the agreement and can properly be considered as evidence of an agreement only when a formal agreement would itself have made a binding contract. But a formal agreement to fix a boundary line is not valid, indeed is void, if the parties know, or one of them knows, that the agreed line is not the true line, or, in other words, if there be not an actual or believed uncertainty as to the true line. This is so because under our law title to real property can be transferred only by descent, devise, conveyance inter vivos, or by adverse holding, and to allow parties where their common boundary line was not uncertain or in dispute by a mere agreement to give one title which belongs in another would be the recognition of a mode of transferring title not countenanced by law." Clapp v. Churchill, 164 Cal. 745, 130 Pac. 1061. See, also, Lewis v. Ogram, 149 Cal. 505, 87 Pac. 60, 10 L. R. A. (N. S.) 610, 117 Am. St. Rep. 151; Mann v. Mann, 152 Cal. 23, 91 Pac. 994; Grants Pass Land, etc., Co. v. Brown, 168 Cal. 457, 143 Pac. 754; Friedman v. Southern Cal. T. Co., 179 Cal. 266, 176 Pac. 442; Staniford v. Twombly, 181 Cal. 372, 186 Pac. 599; Wilder v. Nicolaus, 195 Pac. 1068.

[2] The proof produced is not so clear and certain as to require a finding that the line was agreed upon. Grants Pass Land, etc., Co. v. Brown, 168 Cal. 457, 143 Pac. 754.

[3, 4] 2. In an effort to prove an agreed line north of the road, the plaintiff introduced evidence to the effect that in the year 1908 one of the plaintiffs, James Cosgrave, and the defendant W. F. Donovan laid out and agreed upon the location of the line and that the plaintiffs built a fence upon the line so located, Donovan furnishing part of the material. Donovan denies that he agreed to this line. The court found against the plaintiffs on this issue, and, in view of the conflict in the evidence, such finding is conclusive on appeal. Furthermore, the evidence shows that the defendant Kate Donovan, the wife of W. F. Donovan, then owned an undivided interest in said southeast quarter, and that she was neither a party to the alleged agreement nor gave her consent thereto, and consequently was in no wise bound by it.

[5] 3. The court sustained objection to the following question propounded to the defendant W. F. Donovan, who was a witness for the defendants:

"Now, then, after you and Mr. Cosgrave made that survey, and before this action was commenced you had some disagreement, some ill feeling?"

Whether or not the ruling complained of was erroneous, it did not prejudice the substantial rights of the plaintiffs. The witness had testified to but two material matters: (1) Relative to the alleged agreed line north of the road, and, as has been pointed out, that issue was necessarily determined against the plaintiffs because Kate Donovan was not a party to the agreement; (2) that a subsequent survey showed that the plaintiffs' fence north of the road inclosed about an acre of the southeast quarter of the section, and this evidence is uncontradicted. Further, the court did not fix the location of the dividing line, other than by reference to the public land surveys of the United States.

The evidence did not furnish the court with the necessary data to more definitely locate the line.

[6] 4. The court limited its judgment to the lands lying north of the road. The complaint alleged ownership of all of the southwest quarter of the section. The answer does not deny this allegation. The defendants alleged ownership of all of the southeast quarter. The evidence established such ownership. The parties were entitled to have their respective ownerships adjudged. The court found that the plaintiffs are the owners of the southwest quarter of the section, and that the defendant Kate Donovan is the owner of the southeast quarter. The conclusions of law provide that the respective parties are entitled to a decree quieting their titles to said lands and then is added the following: "provided, however, that the lands south of the Old County Road are not affected hereby." The judgment is likewise limited to the lands north of "the Old County Road."

[7] Since the plaintiffs' title to the whole of the southwest quarter is admitted by failure to deny the allegation of ownership in the complaint, no finding on the issue thus tendered was necessary. The proviso quoted is not a finding of fact, but a conclusion merely and does not limit the findings of fact to the lands lying north of the road.

It is ordered that the judgment be modified by striking therefrom, wherever it appears therein, the following clause: "of all that portion lying north of the Old County Road." As thus modified the judgment is affirmed.

We concur: HART, J.; BURNETT, J.

COSGRAVE et al. v. DONOVAN et al. (Sac. 3086.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 11, 1921.)

1. Costs ⟸234 — Respondent pays costs on modification and affirmance.

Where District Court of Appeal modifies and affirms judgment, without giving direction as to costs, respondents are to pay the costs of appeal.

2. Courts ⟸212—Cause not transferred from District Court of Appeal to review costs.

The Supreme Court will not order a cause transferred to it solely for the purpose of reviewing the exercise of the discretionary power of a District Court of Appeal with relation to costs of appeal, where the matter was never in any way suggested to that court.

Appeal from Superior Court, Calaveras County; S. A. Smith, Judge.

Action by Margaret Cosgrave and others against Kate Donovan and another. There was a judgment for defendants, which was affirmed by the District Court of Appeal (199 Pac. 808), and plaintiffs apply for transfer. Application denied.

Dave Cosgrave, of San Francisco, and Snyder & Snyder, or San Andreas, for appellants.

Virgil M. Airola, of San Andreas, for respondents.

PER CURIAM. [1] Judgment was given herein by the District Court of Appeal of the Third Appellate District, modifying the judgment appealed from, and affirming the judgment as thus modified. No direction was given as to costs, with the result that, under the law and our rules, respondents will be compelled to pay the costs of appeal. Application is made to us to transfer the cause to this court solely for the purpose of making provision for the payment of said costs by appellants, it being claimed that under its discretionary power the District Court of Appeal should have provided that appellants do not recover costs of appeal. No application for such a provision was made to the District Court of Appeal.

[2] This court will not order a cause transferred to this court solely for the purpose of reviewing the exercise of the discretionary power of a District Court of Appeal with relation to costs of appeal, where the matter was never in any way suggested to that court.

The application is denied.

YOUNG et al. v. LAGUNA LAND & WATER CO. (Civ. 3833.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. June 13, 1921. Rehearing Denied July 8, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 13, 1921.)

1. Vendor and purchaser ⟸39—Contract referring to unrecorded map is void.

A contract for the sale of land by reference to an unrecorded map is void under Act March 15, 1907 (St. 1907, p. 290), as amended by St. 1913, pp. 570, 571.

2. Appeal and error ⟸193(9)—That a complaint does not state a cause of action may be raised for the first time on appeal.

The objection that a complaint does not state a cause of action may be raised for the first time on appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Russ Avery, Judge.

Action by Florence R. Young and others against the Laguna Land & Water Company, a corporation. From a judgment for defendant, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Woodruff & Shotmaker, of Los Angeles, for appellants.

John E. Biby and Harry C. Biby, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiffs commenced this action to establish the validity and existence of a certain contract for the purchase of land in a subdivision of Los Angeles county, to protect the rights and interest of the plaintiffs under the contract, and to adjudge the contract in full force and effect notwithstanding cancellation thereof by the defendant. The complaint alleges that on May 26, 1919, plaintiff Florence R. Young signed in triplicate a form of contract for the purchase of a certain lot of land in accordance with a map which was thereupon exhibited to her by the defendant; that each of the three original copies so signed by her were left in the custody of the defendant; that they were signed by the proper officers of the defendant, but before any one of said copies was delivered to her the defendant canceled all three copies by stamping the word "canceled" thereon, and refused to recognize the contract as having any binding force. Defendant answered, alleging that the contract upon which plaintiffs sued was signed by inadvertence and mistake; that as soon as the mistake was discovered it notified plaintiffs thereof, offered to restore the portion of the purchase price which had been paid thereon, and tendered plaintiffs a new contract, but that plaintiffs refused to accept tender of the money so paid. Upon the trial the court found, in accordance with the allegations of the answer, that the contract upon which the suit was based was signed through inadvertence and mistake, and also that it was based upon a map or plat of a subdivision of land which defendant was offering for sale to the public, and that said map or plat was never recorded. Judgment was rendered in favor of defendant, from which plaintiffs prosecute this appeal.

[1] The case is controlled by the rule announced in Smith v. Bach (Sup.) 191 Pac. 14. There the court held that a contract for the sale of land by reference to an unrecorded map in violation of the provisions of the act of March 15, 1907 (Stats. 1907, p. 290), was void. This act, though amended in 1913 (Stats. 1913, pp. 570, 571), is not now materially different from that considered by the Supreme Court in the above case. By the rule announced in that case the contract in suit was void from the beginning and is unenforceable. Plaintiffs did not seek rescission of the contract or pray for equitable relief arising out of its execution. They expressly sought the enforcement of the contract, and prayed the court to declare it to be still in full force and effect, and to determine their rights under it. That such relief cannot be had upon a void contract goes without question.

[2] It is argued by appellants on this appeal that the invalidity of the contract by reason of the failure to record the map was not raised in the court below, but that it was raised for the first time by respondent on this appeal. For this reason, it is argued, this court cannot consider the point.

The question was raised by the plaintiffs in the amendment to their complaint, wherein they expressly alleged that the contract for the sale of this lot was made in reference to the map which was exhibited to the plaintiff Florence R. Young, and which had been prepared for recordation at the date of said agreement, but which was never recorded by said defendant at all. Thus, on the face of plaintiffs' complaint, the contract was void and unenforceable. The complaint did not therefore state a cause of action, and of course the insufficiency of a complaint can be raised at any time.

The judgment is affirmed.

RANSOME-CRUMMEY CO. v. FIKES et al.
(Civ. 3735.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. June 13, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 13, 1921.)

1. Municipal corporations ⇐408(2)—Assessment lien for work on street after its acceptance cannot be foreclosed, though act exempting from future taxation subsequently repealed.

Under Vrooman Act, § 20, exempting property owners from future taxation for improvements on a street after its acceptance by city ordinance, an assessment for work done on a street after its acceptance cannot be foreclosed, though such act was thereafter repealed by St. 1911, pp. 626, 635, the work having been completed while the act and such ordinance were still in effect, and though, on the adoption of a charter by the city after such ordinance, a new government was created superseding the old.

2. Municipal corporations ⇐408(2)—Ordinance accepting street, thus precluding enforcement of assessment for subsequent work done as provided in a statute afterward, not affected by adoption of a new charter.

Where a city charter declared that all ordinances and other regulations in force should remain so until changed or repealed, an assessment for work done on a street after its acceptance by ordinance, and while Vrooman Act, § 20, exempting property owners from future taxation for improvements on such street after such acceptance, was still in force, could not be enforced, though such act was repealed (St.

1911, pp. 626, 635), rights existing on the adoption of a charter not being affected in the absence of some provisions abrogating them, especially where the charter provides that existing ordinances shall remain in force until repealed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Clara County; J. R. Welch, Judge.

Action by the Ransome-Crummey Company against Mrs. E. E. Fikes and another. Judgment for defendants and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

R. M. F. Soto, of San Francisco, for appellant.

R. C. McComish and R. M. Wright, both of San Jose, for respondents.

KERRIGAN, J. This action was brought to foreclose a street assessment for certain street work done under a freeholders' charter amounting to the sum of $304.39. The work performed was for the improvement of Santa Clara street, in the city of San Jose. Judgment was in favor of defendants, and plaintiff appeals.

The record on appeal consists of the judgment roll, together with a stipulation to the effect that the original complaint, which is omitted from the record, is identical with the amended complaint except as to the date of filing, and that it lacks the recitals as to the affidavit concerning noncollusion and noncollateral agreements found in the amended complaint, and which are required to be filed before an assessment can be issued.

The complaint contains eight paragraphs, the first six of which in substance allege the various steps taken from the adoption of the resolution of intention down to and including the return of the warrant, resulting in the assessment roll. It is alleged that the resolution of intention to order the work done was adopted in February, 1910, and that the contract, entered into on April 29, 1910, provided for the completion of the work within 60 days. It is next recited that the warrant, assessment, diagram, and certificate of engineer were recorded on September 17, 1910, and that the warrant was returned on October 5, 1912. Then follow allegations to the effect that the work was done according to the contract. Paragraph 7 contains allegations as to fictitious defendants, and the eighth and last paragraph of the complaint avers that defendants should be estopped from objecting to the proceedings or to the doing of the work by plaintiff. The answer contains seven paragraphs. The first is a general denial, and the succeeding five paragraphs contain affirmative matter relating to alleged insufficiency of the posting of notice, collusion, and insufficiency of the bond. The seventh and last paragraph of the answer alleges that the work mentioned in plaintiff's complaint was done upon an accepted street. The trial court found all the allegations of paragraphs 1 to 6 of plaintiff's complaint to be true. This included every allegation in the complaint except the seventh, referring to the fictitious defendants, and the eighth, as to the claimed estoppel. As to these the court found that they were not true. It further found that none of the matters set forth in the defendants' answer were true except that contained in paragraph 7 in regard to the acceptance of the street. With reference to this paragraph the court found in substance as follows: That on the 11th day of November, 1889, the mayor and common council of the city of San Jose found and decided that East Santa Clara street, from Main street to the Coyote river, had been fully constructed, repaired, and improved, and that said mayor and common council then and there passed an ordinance accepting said street, and that such ordinance had never been repealed or modified, and was at the time of the doing of the work mentioned in plaintiff's complaint in full force and effect, and that the work was done upon a portion of said street accepted by the ordinance. In conformity therewith final judgment was entered in favor of defendants.

At the hearing on appeal it was agreed by counsel that the date of the recordation of the assessment, given in paragraph 5 of the amended complaint as the 17th day of September, 1910, was in the original complaint alleged to be the 17th day of September, 1912. Counsel for respondents, however, reserve the objection that we cannot consider this fact for the reason that the trial court found that the allegation of the amended complaint reciting that the recordation was on the 17th of September, 1912, was true.

[1] The ground relied on for a reversal is that this appeal is governed by the decisions of Ransome-Crummey Co. v. Bennett, 177 Cal. 560, 171 Pac. 304, and Ransome-Crummey Co. v. Coulter, 177 Cal. 574, 171 Pac. 308, which decisions, it is claimed, dispose of the ordinance of acceptance in this case, upon which the defense is based, for the reason that it is in legal effect the same as the ordinance involved in each of those cases, as all were adopted under section 20 of the Vrooman Act, so called (St. 1885, p. 160), which was repealed April 5, 1911 (St. 1911, pp. 626, 635).

Appellant contends that the claimed immunity or exemption from future taxation by reason of the acceptance was destroyed by the repeal of section 20 of the Vrooman Act, and cites us to the cases invoked as supporting this contention. It is true that in those cases it is held that certain ordinances accepting streets were abrogated by the repeal of the section in question, and that they therefore constituted no defense to the foreclosure of the assessment liens claimed in those cases. Quite different, however, is the situation that is here presented. In the instant case work was completed in 1910 when section 20 of the Vrooman Act was still in full force and effect. This distinction is fully recognized in the Bennett and Coulter Cases, for it is there expressly held that, while the law providing for the exemption remained in force the immunity that it created still existed. See, also, Barber Asphalt Co. v. Jurgens, 170 Cal. 273, 149 Pac. 560; Same v. Abrahamson, 38 Cal. App. 109, 175 Pac. 490.

Counsel seeks to avoid the effect of this express declaration in the opinion in the Bennett Case by claiming that, upon the adoption by the city of San Jose of its charter in 1897, a new government was created which superseded the old, especially as to municipal affairs, as to which it is claimed a new régime was to control in the future, the new charter being prospective. This same point was raised by appellant's counsel in the Bennett Case, but it was not expressly passed upon, and it is here claimed that, notwithstanding this fact, the decision covered all the points of law which were involved in the contention of each party, and which must necessarily have been considered to enable the court to reach the conclusion that the ordinance constituted no defense, although the opinion of the court did not in express terms decide that this particular contention was or was not well founded. We see no force in this contention. The court expressly held, as above indicated, that, while the statute creating the exemption exists, the immunity from future assessments was not extinguished. As before stated, at the time the work here involved was performed both the act and the ordinance were in force.

[2] That rights existing upon the adoption of a charter are not affected in the absence of some provision abrogating such preexisting rights is expressly held in Barber Asphalt Co. v. Jurgens, 170 Cal. 273, 149 Pac. 560. Not only is there an absence of such a provision here, but the charter of San Jose contains an express declaration that all ordinances and other regulations in force shall remain so until changed or repealed. A change made in the organic law under which cities of a designated class are organized or controlled does not repeal existing ordinances, and they remain in full force after the adoption of a new charter, and especially so where, as here, it is provided in the charter that existing ordinances shall so remain until repealed. 1 Dillon on Mun. Corp. (5th Ed.) §§ 233, 234; 23 Cyc. 387. There is nothing expressed in the Bennett and Coulter Cases that in any manner rejects this doctrine. On the contrary, it is expressly recognized.

Counsel for respondent also invoke the statute of limitations against appellant. It is pointed out that, as the record shows that the assessment and diagram were recorded on the 17th day of September, 1910, and on the same day delivered to plaintiff, his action commenced on the 17th day of September, 1914, was too late, the limit being two years. The statements of respective counsel in their briefs as to when the original complaint was filed do not agree, and the stipulation in the record does not contain the full date. However, considering the conclusion we have reached, a discussion and decision upon the question becomes unimportant.

Judgment affirmed.

COALINGA MOHAWK OIL CO. v. R. H. HERRON CO. et al. (Civ. 3830.)

1. Contracts ⟸346(11)—Agreement pleaded held not to sustain allegations.

Where the complaint alleged a contract whereby defendant agreed to deliver to buyer stated amounts of oil well casings on specified dates, the written contract in evidence stating that deliveries were not guaranteed, but that the seller would do all he could to procure deliveries on the dates specified, do not sustain the allegations, and the seller could rely upon its denial of the execution of the contract pleaded.

2. Contracts ⟸172—Prior war orders held to excuse delivery of oil well casings.

Where the seller expressly refused to guarantee deliveries, but promised to use its best efforts to procure deliveries on the dates stated, proof that the particular kind of casing specified could be procured from a single manufacturer, with whom the government had placed large orders for war materials, which had priority over private orders, and which delayed deliveries, establishes that the seller did not neglect or refuse to deliver the casing described.

3. Appeal and error ⟸1068(4)—Error as to damages immaterial where no breach was shown.

Where the trial court properly found that defendant was guilty of no breach of its contract, alleged conflict in findings with reference to the damages and failure to find on the issue of special damages are immaterial.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; J. P. Wood, Judge.

Action for breach of contract by the Coalinga Mohawk Oil Company against the R. H.

Herron Company and others. Judgment for defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

C. W. Durbrow and F. B. Austin, both of San Francisco, and W. I. Gilbert, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Geo. E. Whitaker, of Bakersfield, and Kemp & Clewett, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff appeals from a judgment in favor of defendants in a suit to recover damages for breach of contract. The complaint alleged that on the 5th day of March, 1917, plaintiff and defendants entered into a written contract whereby defendants agreed to sell to plaintiff and plaintiff agreed to purchase from defendants certain quantities of oil well casing, and that defendants agreed to make deliveries thereof on certain specified dates. It was then alleged that defendants had failed to make deliveries; that the price of such casing had greatly increased over the price fixed in the contract; that when the contract was executed the defendants knew that plaintiff intended to use the casing for the purpose of drilling oil wells; and that, by reason of the failure in delivery of the casing, plaintiff had been damaged to the extent of $102,660, segregated as follows: Increased cost of casing, $12,350; interest on other equipment purchased by plaintiff, but remaining idle on account of failure to deliver casing, $1,750; anticipated profits from oil wells if they had been sunk as contemplated, $88,560.

Demurrers to the complaint were overruled, and separate answers were filed by each defendant. The Oil Well Supply Company denied the execution of any contract with plaintiff, and, as the trial court found in accordance with this denial, this defendant may be dismissed from further consideration. The defendant R. H. Herron Company denied the execution of the contract pleaded in the complaint, and set forth in hæc verba the full contract entered into between the parties; it then set forth facts upon which it relied to excuse performance of the contract so pleaded.

Consideration should first be given to the pleadings. If the plaintiff had fully pleaded the contract, which was in fact executed without any further allegation than those appearing in its complaint, the action would have fallen on demurrer. By an incomplete statement of the transaction plaintiff was able to put forth a complaint for breach of contract to deliver certain specified quantities of casing on specific dates, whereas the contract actually made contained the specific proviso:

"We cannot guarantee deliveries, but have promise for shipment as near to the dates you mention as it is possible for the mill to ship. We will do all we possibly can to have the goods shipped."

This is far different from the contract pleaded by plaintiff:

"That defendants agreed to deliver 3,500 feet of * * * casing on October 1, 1917; 3,500 feet * * * on January 1, 1918," etc.

[1] Plaintiff failed to sustain the allegations of its complaint that the contract pleaded was either executed or breached. The defendant could have rested upon its denial of the execution of such a contract. The finding of the trial court that the contract pleaded was never entered into was amply supported by the evidence, and is in itself sufficient to warrant an affirmance of the judgment.

However, the defendant R. H. Herron Company elected to go further, and put in issue another contract and alleged facts to excuse its failure to perform it. This issue was tried, and the bulk of the testimony related to the circumstances surrounding the transaction between the parties, and the conditions which prevented said defendant from making the deliveries at the time requested by plaintiff.

[2] In this connection evidence was offered to prove that this particular kind of casing could be procured from a single manufacturer in Pittsburg, Pa.; that about the time the contract was executed the United States Government placed large orders with this concern for war materials; that such orders had precedence over all other orders from private concerns, both as to manufacture in the mills and transporation over railroad lines; that defendant R. H. Herron Company did not neglect or refuse to deliver the casing described, but did all in its power reasonably to procure shipment and make deliveries as requested by plaintiff.

[3] The court found these facts to be true. The finding is supported by the evidence, and is sufficient to sustain the judgment. The alleged conflict in the findings in reference to the damages suffered and the failure to find on the issue of special damages are alike immaterial, since no damages were recoverable.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. WYMER. (Cr. 961.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. June 15, 1921. Rehearing Denied July 15, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 13, 1921.)

1. Evidence ⊂⊃552(1)—Fact in issue may be proved by direct or by circumstantial evidence.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1870, subd. 15, a fact in issue may be proved either by direct evidence or by proof of other facts or circumstances from which the fact in issue may be inferred.

2. False pretenses ⊂⊃47, 49(1)—Conduct and declarations of defendant may be looked to, to furnish evidence corroborative of complaining witness.

In a prosecution for obtaining money by false pretenses by representing to the complaining witness that defendant held a contract with the government to cut wood in certain mountains for the use of the United States army, and that he needed money with which to pay the men, etc., the circumstances connected with the transaction, the entire conduct of defendant, and his declarations to other persons, are proper matters for the consideration of the jury, and may be looked to, to furnish the corroborative evidence contemplated by Pen. Code, § 1110, where the false pretense is oral.

3. False pretenses ⊂⊃49(1) — Circumstances corroborating complaining witness held to justify inference defendant made false statements.

In a prosecution for obtaining money by false pretenses by representing to the complaining witness that defendant held a contract with the government to cut wood in certain mountains for the use of the United States army, and that he needed money with which to pay the men, etc., facts and circumstances disclosed held to constitute corroborative evidence from which the jury could infer that defendant made the false statements to the complaining witness as charged and testified to by her, thus satisfying Pen. Code, § 1110, providing that where the false pretense is oral, it must be proved by the testimony of two witnesses or of one witness and corroborating circumstances.

4. Criminal law ⊂⊃1159(5)—Verdict of jury on sufficient evidence conclusive.

On appeal in a prosecution for obtaining money by false pretenses, where there is sufficient circumstantial evidence corroborative of the complaining witness, as required by Pen. Code, § 1110, justifying the jury in inferring that defendant made the false statements to the complaining witness as charged and as testified to by her, the verdict is conclusive; the jurisdiction of the Appellate Court under such circumstances being limited to questions of law alone.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Michael J. Roche, Judge.

Reginald G. P. Wymer was convicted of obtaining money by false pretenses, and from the judgment and from an order refusing his motion for new trial he appeals. Judgment and order affirmed.

Nathan S. Lee, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the people.

WASTE, P. J. The defendant was charged with obtaining money by false pretenses. The trial resulted in a verdict of guilty, and from the judgment of conviction and sentence defendant appeals, after motion for a new trial made and denied.

The information charged, and the complaining witness testified, that the appellant stated to her that he held a contract with the United States government to cut and supply wood in the Santa Cruz mountains to be used by the United States army; that the contract was worth $5,000 to him; that he needed money from time to time with which to pay the men who were working for him in order to complete the contract, and asked the complaining witness to advance these sums to him, promising her to repay the money when the contract was complete. Believing and relying upon the representations, the complaining witness advanced various sums of money to the defendant at different times, amounting in all to $4,000, which sum has never been paid. It was established at the trial that these statements were untrue; that defendant had no contract for cutting and supplying wood with the United States government, or, so far as the record discloses, with any other person. The defendant admitted getting the money, but testified it was advanced in contemplation of his making a sale of an apartment house belonging to the complaining witness.

[1, 2] Section 1110 of the Penal Code provides that where the false pretense is oral, it must be proved by the testimony of two witnesses, or of one witness and corroborating circumstances. The complaining witness, Mrs. Sears, was the only one who gave direct testimony to the false statements made to her by the appellant. But a fact in issue may be proved either by direct evidence of the facts, or by proof of other facts, or circumstances, from which the fact in issue may be inferred. Code Civ. Proc. § 1870, subd. 15; People v. Donnolly, 143 Cal. 394, 398, 77 Pac. 177; People v. Seeley, 139 Cal. 118, 123, 72 Pac. 834. Mrs. Sears had listed her apartment house with the defendant for sale, and was frequently in his office during the time she was advancing money to him. Maud Howell, a stenographer in the office during the time, testified that she heard defendant say to some one (she did not know to whom) that he had a contract for cutting wood in the Santa Cruz mountains, and that he had to go down at the end of each week and pay his men, and that it took considerable money. Mrs. Louisa Betz testified that the defendant called on Mrs. Sears at her home very many times, and was most importunate in asking her to loan him money. In this class of cases the circumstances connected with the transaction, the entire conduct of the defendant, and his declarations to other persons, are proper matters for the consideration of the jury, and may be looked to, to furnish the corroborative evidence contemplated by the law. People v. Gibbs, 98 Cal. 661, 33 Pac. 630; People v. Martin, 102 Cal. 558, 565, 36 Pac. 952. The testimony of the witnesses Maud Howell and Mrs. Betz was therefore properly admitted by the court, and its refusal to strike it out was not error.

[3, 4] While the facts and circumstances disclosed in this case are not extensive, it cannot be said there is not corroborative evidence from which the jury could draw the inference that the defendant made the false statements to the complaining witness as charged and as testified to so strongly by her. Therefore the verdict of the jury is conclusive, as the jurisdiction of this court under such circumstances is limited to questions of law alone.

The judgment and the order refusing a new trial are, and each is, affirmed.

Ex parte BALLAS. (Cr. 569.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 8, 1921.)

1. Habeas corpus ⟸4, 27—Granted on behalf of convicted person when lack of jurisdiction clearly appears on face of record.

The writ of habeas corpus is not granted for the release of persons convicted of felonies in the absence of a clear and unquestionable showing upon the face of the record that the court was wholly without jurisdiction, but if, on the face of the record, it plainly or undebatably appears that there was a lack of jurisdiction, the writ may be granted instead of requiring the applicant to pursue his more dilatory remedy by appeal.

2. Habeas corpus ⟸3—Convicted person left to remedy by appeal when question of jurisdiction of more than ordinary importance.

Where an application for a writ of habeas corpus by a person convicted of forgery by raising a check involves a legal proposition of more than ordinary importance concerning the jurisdiction of the court of the county in which the bank on which the check was drawn was situated, the check having been cashed in another county, and an appeal is pending on which the question may be decided, and on which the people may have a review by the Supreme Court if the decision of the District Court of Appeal is adverse, the writ will be discharged, especially where the prisoner is at liberty under bail.

Original application by P. J. Ballas for a writ of habeas corpus directed to the sheriff of Yolo county. Writ discharged.

A. G. Bailey, of Woodland, and Alfred S. Ormsby and E. B. Taylor, both of Martinez, for petitioner.

C. C. McDonald, Dist. Atty., of Woodland, and U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for respondent.

HART, J. The petitioner was convicted in the superior court of the county of Yolo of the crime of forgery, the information (made a part of the petition for the writ) under which he was so convicted alleging that he raised a check issued to him by one Jessa Dunsmore on the First National Bank of Woodland, at Woodland, Yolo county, from the sum of 65 cents, for which the check was originally drawn, to the sum of $65. The information further alleged that the defendant passed said check on the Bank of Martinez, at Martinez, Contra Costa county, and that said bank cashed said check by paying to defendant the sum of $65, the ostensible value thereof.

This application of petitioner for writ of habeas corpus is based upon the contention that the jurisdiction of the alleged offense is solely in the superior court of Contra Costa county, and that therefore his conviction of the offense in the superior court of Yolo county is coram non judice, and void.

At the hearing of this petition, among other contentions advanced by the district attorney of Yolo county in resistance to the petition, it was maintained that the petition here would not lie, for the reason that there was available to the petitioner an adequate remedy in the ordinary course of law—that is, by appeal.

It was admitted by counsel for the petitioner at the hearing hereof that an appeal had been taken to this court in the latter's behalf from the judgment of conviction of which he here complains. It was further stated by counsel that, after the issuance of this writ by this court, and before the hearing of this application, the petitioner was admitted to bail by the superior court of Yolo county; that he furnished the required bail, was thereupon discharged from custody, and was, at the time of the hearing of this petition, at liberty; and, we may assume that he is still at liberty.

[1] The courts of this state have never made a practice of releasing persons convicted of felonies through the writ of habeas corpus in the absence of a clear and unquestionable showing upon the face of the record of the case that the court in which the conviction was had was wholly without jurisdiction to try the accused for the offense charged, and of which he had been convicted. If, upon the face of the record of conviction, it plainly or undebatably appears that there was a lack of jurisdiction to try the accused, then there would be no serious objection to releasing the accused through the writ here applied for, rather than to require him to pursue his more dilatory remedy by appeal.

[2] In this proceeding there has been submitted for solution a legal proposition of more than ordinary importance, and, while it is true that it could as easily be determined in this proceeding as in a proceeding by way of appeal, yet, after giving the matter due consideration, we have reached the conclusion that, all the circumstances considered, the decision of the question on the appeal which is now pending is preferable to a decision thereof here. Frankly, we may say that we have not so considered the merits of this application as to enable us to satisfy ourselves one way or the other upon the question presented, but, as one reason for preferring to pass a definite opinion thereon on the appeal now pending, we may suggest that, should we in the latter case be persuaded to the conclusion that the petitioner's claim for release is meritorious, or of legal force, the people could, nevertheless, pursue their position to the Supreme Court, which they could not do in the case of the release of the prisoner under the writ. Moreover, in discharging this writ, we do so knowing that the petitioner can in no way be prejudiced thereby, since he not only has an adequate remedy by appeal, but is prosecuting that remedy. Besides, he is not under restraint of his personal liberty, and perhaps will not be under such restraint pending the determination of his case by appeal.

For the reasons given, the writ is discharged.

GADETTE v. RECORDER'S COURT OF CITY OF EAST SAN DIEGO.
(Civ. 3333.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. June 6, 1921.)

1. Costs ⊂=137—Requirement that proceedings be stayed till nonresident plaintiff give required security for costs mandatory.

Code Civ. Proc. § 1036, providing that when a nonresident plaintiff is required by defendant to give security for costs, all proceedings in the action "must" be stayed till an undertaking is filed, is mandatory.

2. Prohibition ⊂=3(1)—Lies to prevent further proceedings till nonresident plaintiff gives security for costs.

Prohibition lies to prevent further proceedings in an action till the nonresident plaintiff therein gives the required security for costs under Code Civ. Proc. § 1036; defendant therein having no plain, speedy, and adequate remedy at law.

3. Costs ⊂=111—Demand for security, though not stating plaintiff was a nonresident, sufficient.

Demand for "security * * * for * * * costs * * * under Code Civ. Proc. § 1036" is sufficient without stating that plaintiff was a nonresident; the section providing for giving security only when plaintiff is a nonresident or a foreign corporation.

4. Costs ⊂=111—Demand for security alone stays proceedings.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1036, providing that when plaintiff is a nonresident security for costs may be required by defendant, and when required all proceedings in the action must be stayed till an undertaking is filed, demand, by notice that security is required, is sufficient to stay proceedings, without proof of plaintiff being a nonresident, unless plaintiff claims to be a resident.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; C. N. Andrews, Judge.

Petition by L. Gadette for prohibition against the Recorder's Court of the City of East San Diego. From an adverse judgment, plaintiff appeals. Reversed, with directions.

Charles B. Delong, of San Diego, for appellant.

Arthur T. French, of San Diego, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. Appellant filed a petition in the superior court of the county of San Diego for a writ of prohibition directed against the recorder's court of East San Diego. A general demurrer was interposed by the defendant and was sustained, and the appeal is taken from the judgment entered upon the petitioner's failure to amend.

The petition alleged the beginning of an action in the recorder's court of East San Diego wherein one Ava C. Roberts was plaintiff and L. Gadette was defendant; that said plaintiff was at the commencement of said action a resident of another state; that in said action the defendant therein had filed a demurrer and at the same time filed with the recorder's court and served upon the plaintiff a notice requiring security for costs as provided in section 1036, Code of Civil Procedure; that notwithstanding the filing of said notice, the recorder's court subsequently heard the demurrer and overruled the same, and ordered the defendant to answer forthwith and thereupon entered judgment in favor of plaintiff and against defendant; that the recorder's court was about to enforce this judgment and the plaintiff in said action entirely failed to deposit a bond as required by said notice.

The case of Carter v. Superior Court, 176 Cal. 752, 169 Pac. 667, is relied upon by both the appellant and respondent. In that case the plaintiff was a resident of Oregon; defendant made demand, as provided in section 1036, Code of Civil Procedure, for security, etc.; plaintiff filed an undertaking with but one surety. After the expiration of 30 days from the date of demand, defendant moved to dismiss the action on the ground that the undertaking did not comply with the law. The court points out that in section 1037, Code of Civil Procedure, the word "may" is used and not "must," which authorizes the dismissal of an action where the undertaking is not filed within the time provided. The view is expressed that in so far as passing upon the motion to dismiss is concerned, the court is "acting in the exercise of its jurisdiction whether it grants or denies the motion"; "that in the absence of a dismissal the court retains jurisdiction of the case."

In construing section 1037, Code of Civil Procedure, the language of the opinion in Meade County Bank v. Bailey, 137 Cal. 447, 70 Pac. 297, is quoted with approval. A part of the opinion thus reaffirmed is as follows:

"The statute vests in the defendant the right to have the bond. * * * When the demand for security for costs is made in the proper case, the law itself enjoins further proceedings on the part of the plaintiff until the demand is complied with according to the provisions of the Code."

[1] It will be noted that section 1036, Code of Civil Procedure, employs the word "must." The provision is mandatory. It differs from that of section 1037, Code of Civil Procedure, allowing a dismissal of action, in that no discretion is here allowed the court. "All proceedings in the action or special proceeding must be stayed."

[2] Referring further to Carter v. Superior Court, supra, it is there held that prohibition will lie to prevent further proceedings pending the filing of the undertaking, and that a defendant is entitled to such a writ because he has no plain, speedy, and adequate remedy at law.

[3] Respondent suggests that the demand was insufficient, in that it does not, in terms, state that the plaintiff was either a foreign corporation or a nonresident. This defect is one of uncertainty. The demand is for "security from plaintiff for defendant's costs and charges * * * as provided for under section 1036, Code of Civil Procedure, of the state of California." We think this language was sufficient to apprise plaintiff that it was claimed that she was either a foreign corporation or a nonresident.

[4] Respondent urges that a demand alone is not sufficient to stay the proceedings, but asserts that there must be, in addition to demand, proof submitted to the court that the plaintiff is either a nonresident or a foreign corporation. No other action on the part of the demanding party appears to have been contemplated by the Legislature than that he should require security as provided in section 1036, Code of Civil Procedure, by a "notice" that security is required. In the case at bar, Gadette served notice, and thereby required security for his costs and charges. Doubtless plaintiff might have contested the right of defendant to an undertaking. The Code is indefinite as to how the fact of nonresidence is to be determined in case it is disputed. But the record does not disclose that the respondent in any way indicated to the recorder's court that she claimed to be a resident of California.

The decisions of courts of last resort of other states are of but little value in passing upon this point because the statutes which they interpret, in most instances, especially provide that where security is required on the ground of nonresidence of the plaintiff, the defendant must proceed by motion or notice accompanied by affidavits. The statute of West Virginia, which was construed in Dean v. Cannon, 37 W. Va. 123, 16 S. E. 444, is quite like that of California. The opinion as to the point in question is in part as follows:

"By * * * the Code of West Virginia (Ed. 1891) p. 877, c. 138, § 2, the notice is required to be given by a suggestion on the record of the court, * * * 'that the plaintiff is not a resident of this state and that security is required of him.' The present law requires no other notice, nor the entry or service of any rule; for section 2, c. 138, continues: 'After sixty days from such suggestion the suit shall, by order of the court, be dismissed unless before the dismission the plaintiff be proved to be a resident of the state, or security be given.'"

It was held that no other showing than the suggestion on the record in court was necessary to enable the defendant to claim the benefit of this provision for security. Vance v. Bird, 4 Munf. (18 Va.) 364, is to the same effect.

The judgment is reversed, and the superior court is directed to overrule the demurrer.

FAY IMPROVEMENT CO. v. DE BUDGE.
(Civ. 3694.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 19, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 18, 1921.)

1. Contracts ⊂=195—Owner's contract to pay for street improvement work in front of his "own property" held applicable to adjoining lots of his children.

Owner who included frontage of adjoining lots owned by his minor children in the frontage specified following his name in street improvement contract, was liable for improvements apportioned to lots owned by the children, notwithstanding provision of contract making the parties thereto liable only for the work done in front of their "own property," in view of evidence that both contractor and such owner, in execution of the contract, intended the quoted term to include, as to such owner, the lots owned by his children.

2. Guardian and ward ⊂=58—Guardian entitled to credit for money spent in improvement of wards' property.

A guardian is entitled to credit in his account as guardian for money spent in improving and repairing the property of his wards.

3. Guardian and ward ⊂=48 — Guardian personally liable upon contract made for wards' benefit.

A guardian is personally liable on any contract made for the benefit of his ward.

4. Pleading ⊂=311—Contractor's complaint in action on street improvement contract held sufficient to show foot frontage of defendant's land.

In contractor's action on street improvement contract, complaint having affixed thereto the contract containing the frontage of defendant's lots and alleging that defendant owner agreed to pay to contractor upon the completion of the work his respective pro rata share of the cost of the improvement computed in accordance with the frontage of his lots, and that the total pro rata share of defendant amounted to a specified sum, held sufficient, as against contention that the number of feet of land owned by defendant was not pleaded.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Geo. H. Cabaniss, Judge.

Action by the Fay Improvement Company against William De Budge. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

W. F. Stafford and Wm. M. Stafford, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

John R. Daniels, of San Francisco, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment against him for $845 for street work done by the plaintiff under a contract with various owners of property fronting on Crescent avenue between Leese and Murray streets, San Francisco, including the intersection of Leese street and Crescent avenue. The appellant owned one lot of land on Crescent avenue, with a frontage of 25 feet. His three minor children owned three lots fronting on the same street and adjoining his property. The improvements were made under two separate contracts, one for the block proper, and the other for the intersection. Copies of these contracts were attached to and made a part of the complaint. The defendant became a party to both contracts, and, according to the testimony, personally affixed the land frontage after his name as 123 feet 5 inches on the contract for the improvement of Crescent avenue and 156 feet and 8 inches for the intersection of Leese street and Crescent avenue. In addition to these improvements the plaintiff repaired a sidewalk and constructed three side sewers at the request of defendant. Recovery for this repair work and sewer construction is included in the judgment, and to this portion thereof the appellant does not object.

In his answer defendant admitted entering into the two contracts sued upon, but denied responsibility for the improvements except those which were apportioned to the 25-foot lot which he personally owned on Crescent avenue. It was admitted that the defendant is the legal guardian of the persons and estates of his three children who owned the three lots on Crescent avenue, having frontages which made up the difference between the frontage signed after the defendant's name in the contracts, and the 25 feet for which he concedes himself to be liable.

It is perfectly apparent from all testimony that the defendant intended to contract for his children's property as well as for his own individual holdings. The evidence is that when Mr. Fay, the agent for the plaintiff, called upon defendant in relation to these contracts—

"He said that the corner was held by the two children, who he was guardian for, and he would sign for them; I says 'Certainly, as long as you have the power to do so, do it.' So he signed the full frontage for them, and then he segregated the side sewers and everything pertaining to the full amount of the property, and left it there, and nothing was said about it until afterwards, when he wanted to discount his bill."

On cross-examination, Mr. Fay testified:

"Q. You stated that he said he owned one lot about the middle of the block and three lots at the corner of Leese were owned by his three children; is that right? A. Yes.

"Q. One lot apiece? A. Yes.

"Q. And he asked you if he would sign for all of them or for one? A. Yes.

"Q. And you told him to sign for all; is that right? A. That is right; yes."

The contract for the work on Crescent avenue contained the following provision:

"And the said parties of the second part, in consideration of the premises, each for himself or herself, and not one for the others, promises to and with the said party of the first part, that he or she will pay to the said party of the first part in gold coin of the United States of America, for the work done in front of his or her own property respectively, and not in front of others, upon the completion thereof, and for such work as may be done in the crossings or intersections for which their property is liable, together with the incidental expenses according to the ratio that his or her frontage bears to the whole frontage here represented, and in accordance with the rule established by the street law."

The contract for the work at the intersection of the streets contains a similar provision.

It is contended by appellant that by this clause the defendant contracted to pay only for the work done in front of "his own property," and not for the work done in front of property owned by any one else. There is nothing definite in the contract about the character of the interest in property which would make such property one's "own" property within the language of this contract. It is not specified whether the ownership is to be a legal or an equitable one, whether it must be an estate in fee simple absolute, a life estate, or a contingent remainder. "Own property" is an inexact and general term, and might be ambiguous if it were shown that the contracting party had a different character of estate in several lots upon the street. However, the parties have shown by their actions just what construction was placed by them upon the terms of the contract and was intended by them in using this language. To ascertain such intention is, of course, the object of our inquiry here.

[1-3] It is shown by the testimony above quoted that both parties intended to contract with reference to the lots held by the defendant in his own name, and also the lots owned by his minor children for whom he was guardian. Although technically these might not all be included in the connotation of the term "own property," nevertheless their inclusion therein was what was in the minds of the parties at the time, as is clearly proven by the evidence in the record. There is nothing strange or unusual about a father undertaking to pay for street improvements in front of the property owned by his minor children, and most especially is this true when he is the guardian of the persons and estates of such children. He would be entitled to credit in his account as guardian for money spent in improving and repairing the property of his wards. Estate of Beisel, 110 Cal. 267, 40 Pac. 961, 42 Pac. 819. A guardian is personally liable upon any contract made for the benefit of his ward. Woerner on Guardianship, § 57, p. 185.

It appears that the agent of the plaintiff and the defendant discussed the question of frontage and estimated the amount for which the defendant intended to contract. The defendant himself wrote after his signature the amount of such frontage as 123 feet and 5 inches in the contract for Crescent avenue and 156 feet, 8 inches, in the contract for the work at the intersection, which is the combined frontages of his own lot and those of his minor children. Under such circumstances there can be no question about the fact that he intended to contract to pay for the improvement of all these lots.

[4] It is contended by appellant that the plaintiff should have set out in his pleading the number of feet of land owned by defendant. The plaintiff pleaded the effect of the contracts, alleging that the defendant agreed to pay to the plaintiff upon the completion of the work, his respective pro rata share of the cost of the improvements, computed in accordance with the frontage of his lots on Crescent avenue and Leese street. Then follows an averment that the total pro rata share of said defendant of the total cost of said improvements under the terms of the contract amounted to a certain sum. The "frontage of his lots under the terms of the contract" is necessarily implied in the foregoing allegations, as it is arrived at by a simple and certain arithmetical process, and we have already discussed the question of what must be included in the term "his lots" for the purpose of this contract, as evidenced by the conversations and acts of the parties. Furthermore, the contracts themselves were attached to the complaint and they contain, after the signatures of the parties, the number of feet frontage for which each party intends to contract. We think this is sufficient.

There are no other points made upon this appeal. The judgment is affirmed.

1. Evidence ⟸129(6)—Evidence of similar contract with others held admissible to establish contract.

In an action to compel a purchaser of timber lands to pay the sums which vendor agreed to pay for homestead relinquishments, where the purchaser was in effect a reorganization of the vendor corporation, that the purchaser had paid for homestead relinquishments under another agreement made by the vendor corporation is admissible as a circumstance tending to show it had agreed to assume the obligations of its vendor for such relinquishment, in view of Code Civ. Proc. § 1870, subd. 15, providing that a fact in issue may be proved either by direct evidence or by circumstances from which it may be inferred.

2. Trial ⟸68(1)—Refusal to reopen case to admit portions of written contract held not abuse of discretion.

Where the trial court had properly refused to permit oral testimony as to the contents of a written contract, but defendants did not offer the contract in evidence because they did not desire to make public certain of its terms, it was not an abuse of the trial court's discretion to refuse, after the conclusion of the trial, to reopen the case to permit the introduction in evidence of certain portions only of that contract.

3. Public lands ⟸135(2)—Evidence held to sustain finding purchaser of timber lands assumed vendor's agreement to pay for relinquishments.

In an action to recover the amount agreed to be paid for homestead relinquishments, evidence held sufficient to sustain a finding that the appealing defendant, who had purchased the lands relinquished to its codefendant, had assumed the obligation of its codefendant to pay for those relinquishments.

4. Public lands ⟸135(2)—Agreement to use diligence to perform condition implied.

In a contract requiring a lumber company to pay for homestead relinquishments when it secured patents to the lands, but fixing no time for performance, there was an implied agreement that the lumber company should exercise reasonable diligence to procure title within a reasonable time.

5. Public lands ⟸135(2)—Reasonable time for securing patents held to have elapsed so that payments for relinquishments were due.

In a suit to recover payments for homestead relinquishments which were to be paid when defendant secured title, evidence that five years had elapsed since the contract was made, and that defendants had secured patents to other lands acquired under similar circumstances, held sufficient, in the absence of a showing of any attempt to secure the title to the lands in controversy, to sustain a finding that a reasonable time to secure the patents had elapsed so that the relinquishment payments were due.

6. Appeal and error ⟸1178(6)—Issues correctly decided need not be retried on reversal for insufficiency of evidence on other issues.

Where plaintiff sued on claim of his own and on claims assigned to him by four others, and recovered judgment which must be reversed because the evidence failed to establish assignments of two of the claims, the case need not be remanded to try those issues which had been correctly decided for plaintiff, but will be remanded, with directions to try only the issue of the assignment of those two claims.

Robert Duncan, of San Francisco, for respondent.

WASTE, P. J. This is an appeal by the Goodyear Redwood Company, one of the defendants, from a judgment rendered against it and its codefendant, the L. E. White Lumber Company. The plaintiff is one of a number of settlers who relinquished to the L. E. White Lumber Company certain homestead rights and claims to timber lands in Mendocino county. The complaint is in five counts, each of which states a cause of action as against the defendants' general demurrer. In the first, plaintiff seeks to recover upon an alleged oral agreement made by the defendant White Company to pay him $3,750 for a homestead relinquishment, and for services rendered in connection with securing like relinquishments from other settlers, which obligation, it is alleged, the appellant assumed and agreed to pay. The other four counts are based upon assignments to plaintiff by other settlers of similar causes of action against the defendant. The trial court found the allegations of the various counts of the complaint to be true, and entered the judgment in favor of plaintiff, from which this appeal is taken.

The alleged insufficiency of the evidence to support the trial court's finding that for a valuable consideration the Goodyear Redwood Company assumed and agreed to pay to the plaintiff and his assignors the amounts due and unpaid for the various relinquishments obtained from them by the White Company presents the meritorious contention to be considered on this appeal.

In support of the allegation that such was the fact, the respondent was compelled to rely upon testimony produced from the camp of his adversaries, and upon evidence of other facts, which, while not so intimately connected with the transactions in suit as to form part of them, tended in some degree to support plaintiff's cause of action. The defendant offered no testimony on the main point in controversy, and practically submitted the cause on the showing made by the plaintiff.

The record discloses that the L. E. White Lumber Company was engaged in operating a sawmill at Greenwood in Mendocino county. It had acquired by purchase and assignment all the rights of one F. A. Hyde in and to certain timber lands in the vicinity, under selections made by Hyde upon forest lieu scrip held by him. The plaintiff and his assignors, together with many other settlers, claimed rights in the same lands, based upon alleged homestead entries. As a result of the controversy which arose between the Lumber Company and the settlers, and on the eve of a hearing of the respective claims before the United States commissioner at Ukiah, it was agreed that the settlers would relinquish their rights in consideration of various sums paid to the respective homestead claimants. The Lumber Company, by its representative, Mr. Metson, entered into a written agreement to pay G. S. Arnold, representing 11 of the settlers, a designated sum of money for a relinquishment of these 11 claims, the amount to be paid whenever and as soon as the Lumber Company should obtain patents to the relinquished lands under the forest lieu selection then pending before the United States Land Office.

The plaintiff and his assignors were not parties to this agreement, but at about the same time, and growing out of the same controversy, the defendant L. E. White Lumber Company entered into an oral agreement with each of them for a like relinquishment of homestead rights. It paid a portion of the agreed amounts, with the definite understanding and agreement that it would pay the balance to each settler when it obtained title to the land. These respective amounts have not been paid, and are the sums sought to be recovered in this action.

The contract with the settlers was made in 1912. In May, 1916, the appellant Goodyear Redwood Company acquired all the property of the L. E. White Lumber Company in Mendocino county. The exact nature of the transaction between appellant and the Lumber Company does not definitely appear from the record. The respondent suggests that it was in the nature of a reorganization of the Lumber Company and the continuation of its business under a new name. From the personnel, and interrelation of the officers and the attorneys of the two corporations, a very strong inference that such was the fact can be drawn. The appellant took over all the property of every kind and nature of the Lumber Company in Mendocino county, including its rights, whatever they were, to the lands which had been in dispute between it and the settlers, irrespective of whether or not title had been acquired. Part of the assets it acquired was a large amount of Santa Fé scrip the Lumber Company had in its possession, and which would be available for use in securing the contested locations in case the government should reject its claims under application of the Hyde scrip. The former manager of the Lumber Company testified that it was to be used for this express purpose. After the transfer of all of its property to appellant the L. E. White Lumber Company refused to pay the license tax required by the state, for the reason that it was doing no business under its franchise. At the time of the sale the appellant was fully informed by the Lumber Company of all agreements it had with the settlers to pay the balance of the money, for the relinquishments, when patents were issued or title secured. That much is certain. After that time the appellant was the active and interested party. Whatever was done in the matter of securing title to the lands was done by it, the officers of the old lumber company "merely assisting," as from time to time requested. The Lumber Company was under no obligation to make good, or pay anything back to appellant in case of failure to secure title to any of the land. It was "out of it," so to speak.

[1] Notwithstanding the relation thus established between the Lumber Company and the appellant, the president of the Lumber Company testified that the appellant did not promise to pay plaintiff and his assignors, or the other settlers, the deferred payments due under their agreements when patents were secured. To meet this testimony the respondent introduced in evidence the contract between the Lumber Company and Arnold on behalf of the 11 homesteaders, to which we have already referred, and followed this with testimony that the appellant had actually paid several of the settlers claiming under that agreement. Appellant contends that the admission of this evidence was error. We think not. A fact in issue may be proved either by direct evidence of the fact, or by proof of other facts, or circumstances, from which the fact in issue may be inferred. Code Civ. Proc. § 1870, subd. 15; Title Insurance Co. v. Kuchenbeiser, 20 Cal. App. 11, 13, 127 Pac. 1039. Any evidence tending to show the probability or improbability of an issue of fact is relevant to such issue. It follows as a very logical inference, from the fact that appellant recognized itself bound by and paid certain settlers according to the terms of one contract, that it was intended that it should, and we think did, assume on its part to pay the Lumber Company's obligation on the other contracts of identical import, made at the same time under the precise circumstances, and for the same purposes. Moody v. Peirano, 4 Cal. App. 411, 420, 88 Pac. 380; Bone v. Hayes, 154 Cal. 759, 767, 99 Pac. 172. In the last case cited it was held that, while ordinarily evidence that a certain contract was made with A. is not admissible to show that a similar contract was made with B., such evidence may, in the discretion of the court, be allowed where the circumstances indicate a strong probability that the course followed in one instance would be followed in others.

[2] At the conclusion of the plaintiff's evidence, the appellant moved for a nonsuit, which motion was denied. Mr. Drew, president of the White Lumber Company, was then called for the defendants. He testified that he conducted negotiations on behalf of the Lumber Company that resulted in the sale to the appellant. When asked if there was any agreement on the part of the appellant to be responsible for, or to assume any of the debts or obligations of, the White Company, it appeared that there was such an agreement, that it was in writing, and that a copy of the contract was in existence. Counsel for the plaintiff successfully objected to any testimony as to its contents unless the witness produced the writing, which was not done. After the trial was concluded, but before decision, the defendants moved to reopen the case, the sole purpose assigned being to introduce certain designated portions of this agreement, which, it was alleged, would refute the claim of appellant's liability to the settlers. The court denied the motion. The sole reason given by the defendants for not producing the written agreement when its contents were under discussion and the cause was on trial, and in attempting to give oral evidence as to its contents, was that its introduction was withheld at the urgent request of the appellant that the contents of the contract be not divulged as appellant did not want to disclose the consideration paid by the Goodyear Redwood Company for the transfer of the White Company's property. The excuse was a weak one, and apparently did not appeal to the court. Furthermore, the introduction of the portions of the contract designated without explanatory testimony would have accomplished little. We think there was no abuse of discretion in refusing to reopen the case.

Some point is made by the respondent of the fact that the president of the Lumber Company, while on the stand and while being examined as to the Arnold contract, made an explanation of his previous testimony, from which it may be argued that he testified that the appellant would be compelled under its agreement with the Lumber Company to pay all contracts with the settlers. The appellant disputes the effect of this testimony, but there is room for argument as to what was meant, and the construction to be put upon the explanation of the witness, in view of the circumstances under which it was made, was a matter for the trial court.

[3] On the whole record we think the lower court was correct in reaching the conclusion that it was a part of the transaction between the Lumber Company and the appellant, that the appellant should, and that it did, assume the payment of the obligations of the Lumber Company to plaintiff and his assignors, and that the finding to that effect is sufficiently supported.

Appellant contends that the agreement between the settlers and the White Company was that the former should not be paid the balance of the sum agreed upon for their relinquishments until the Lumber Company should have perfected title to the property; that even if it shall be held that appellant assumed to pay these obligations, the claims have not yet matured, for it does not appear that title to the property has ever been secured. In this connection it objected to the introduction in evidence of certain patents from the United States government to the Santa Fé Pacific Railroad Company, covering portions of the various lands relinquished by plaintiff and his assignors. But the right of the plaintiff to recover in this action does not depend entirely upon a showing that the appellant has secured title to the lands in question.

[4] No time was fixed in the agreement between the Lumber Company and the settlers as to when it should perfect title to the claims and pay the remaining amounts due. It remained, therefore, for the law to annex as an incident to the contract, that the title should be acquired within a reasonable time. Under the facts of this case the court would certainly find no difficulty in reading into the contract between the Lumber Company and the settlers an obligation on the part of the defendants to use reasonable diligence to secure title to the land, upon the completion of which the payment was contingent. Earl v. Sunnyside Land Co., 150 Cal. 214, 225–226, 88 Pac. 920.

[5] A period of five years elapsed between the making of the contract and the bringing of this action. The lower court was undoubtedly of the view, and we think properly, that a reasonable time for securing title had elapsed. The patents already actually procured are evidence of that fact, and also denote that the title to the land can no longer be in dispute. The appellant has not shown, nor attempted to show, but that the title to the land has been secured for it, nor has it assigned any reason for the long delay in seeking to perfect title if it has not done so, or why, if it be a fact, that cannot be done. Consequently, whether or not title has, as a matter of fact, been acquired by the appellant, we think there is ample reason for holding that payment should now be made to the settlers.

[6] The findings are sufficiently supported by the evidence except in two particulars. The findings that prior to the commencement of this action the settlers E. E. Fitch and J. I. Alander assigned their claims to the plaintiff are not supported. The testimony of the assignor Fitch does not have that effect, and there is no evidence of any kind to prove an assignment by Alander. While for this reason the judgment must be reversed, there is no occasion to order a retrial of the issues which have already been correctly determined. Gray v. Cotton, 166 Cal. 130, 139, 134 Pac. 1145; Fox v. Hale & Norcross Silver Mining Co., 122 Cal. 219, 222, 54 Pac. 731; Tunis v. Lakeport Agricultural Park Association, 98 Cal. 285, 287, 33 Pac. 63, 477.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause remanded, with directions to the trial court to retry the single issue presented by the allegations of the third and fourth causes of action set up in the complaint, and the denials of the answers thereto, and to hear such evidence only as may be offered upon the sole point as to the sufficiency of the assignments of the respective causes of action to the plaintiff before the commencement of this action, and thereupon to enter judgment in favor of plaintiff for the amounts, if any are found due on said causes of action, together with the amounts already found to be due plaintiff on the first, second, and fifth causes of action.

1. Criminal law ⟸402(1)—Erroneous admission of secondary evidence held cured by subsequent foundation proof.

Error in admitting evidence that the number on the box in which the stolen revolver was purchased corresponded with the number on the revolver sold by defendant after the burglary is cured where the prosecuting witness afterwards testified he had searched for the box and had been unable to find it, so that secondary evidence was admissible; it not being necessary that such evidence be thereafter repeated.

2. Criminal law ⟸1043(3)—Accused cannot raise on appeal question not presented to court below.

On appeal from a conviction of burglary, where it appeared that the identification of a revolver sold by defendant with the one stolen rested on identity of numbers on the revolver and on the box in which it was purchased, and the only objection at the trial was on the ground of secondary evidence, the objection that proof of the number on the box was not proof of the number on the revolver purchased cannot be raised on appeal where it was not presented in any way to the court below, since the purpose of an appeal is to review some action of the trial court.

3. Criminal law ⟸1169(2)—Evidence of identification of property otherwise identified by uncontradicted evidence is not prejudicial.

In a prosecution for burglary, where the prosecuting witness had identified a revolver sold by defendant as one stolen at the time of the burglary by the numbers thereon, and there was no evidence contradicting such identity, the admission of an invoice showing the sale of the revolver by number was not prejudicial to accused.

4. Criminal law ⟸798(1) — Refusal of requested instruction each juror should be convinced is not reversible error.

Though a requested instruction that the jury could not convict if any individual juror was not convinced of defendant's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt was one which should have been given, the refusal to give it is not reversible error, since the instruction is, in effect, simply admonitory and cautionary of the sworn duty of the jurors.

5. Burglary ⟸46(1)—Refusal of requested instructions as to reasonable doubt property was taken from house held not error.

In a prosecution for burglary, it was not error to refuse requested instructions that the jury could not convict if they had any reasonable doubt that the property identified as that stolen from prosecuting witness, and which alone established the corpus delicti, was taken from the house, was not erroneous, notwithstanding the witness' testimony he sometimes kept the revolver in his automobile, where he testified positively the revolver was in the house when it was broken and entered.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Sidney N. Reeve, Judge.

Frank Walton was convicted of burglary, and he appeals. Affirmed.

R. D. McLaughlin, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Arthur Keetch, Deputy Atty. Gen., and John W. Maltman, of Los Angeles, for the People.

WORKS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment of conviction of burglary. The residence of one Webster had been entered, and various articles of wearing apparel were left scattered about his rooms, but nothing was missing from the place except a certain revolver. Appellant had been seen loitering about the Webster premises, and he later sold a revolver to a merchant. This revolver was produced at the trial from the merchant's possession, and the appeal turns on the question whether the weapon was the one taken from Webster's residence. It will be observed that the corpus delicti could not have been established except upon a showing of the identity of the revolver missed by Webster with the one produced at the trial. Appellant contends that the trial court committed error in the admission of secondary evidence, over his objections, offered for the purpose of supplying this link in the chain of proof of the corpus delicti.

[1] It was sought by the testimony of Webster to identify the missing revolver with the one produced in court by showing that a serial number on the one was the same as that which appeared on the other. Webster had never seen the number on his revolver, but he was allowed, over the objection of counsel, to state a number which he had seen on the box which contained the weapon when he purchased it. The number mentioned by him was identical with the one on the revolver produced at the trial. It is in the reception of this evidence that it is claimed that the court committed the error to which we have alluded. But, conceding for the sake of argument that the court erred in the ruling under which the statement was received, the error was cured afterward. The court ordered Webster to bring the box into court at the next session. He did not do so, but testified that he had searched for it, and that it could not be found. The testimony as to the extent of the search was scant, but it was probably sufficient to establish the fact that the box was lost. Even if it were not, however, counsel for appellant seems to have been satisfied with it, for after it was in he made no attempt to have stricken from the record Webster's earlier statement of the number appearing on the box. The loss of the box having been proven, Webster could then have been permitted to testify, over the objection that the evidence was secondary, to the figures appearing on it; but, as his evidence on the subject was already in, even if erroneously admitted before proof of loss of the box, it was not necessary to ask him to repeat it after proof of the loss. There was no error in the respect claimed by appellant.

[2] There is a mere mention in appellant's brief of the point that evidence of the number on the box was not evidence that the same number was on the revolver which came to Webster in the box. It is enough to say, as to this point, that it was not made in the trial court. Counsel's only point was that Webster's statement of what the box showed was secondary evidence, and that the box itself should have been produced. As the objection now made was not presented at the trial, it cannot be considered here.

"The purpose of an appeal from a trial court is to review some action of the court, and, as there was no action in this instance, no order which involved the question now sought to be presented, there is nothing to review." People v. Taminago, 35 Cal. App. 238, 169 Pac. 696.

[3] The people sought further to identify Webster's revolver with the one produced at the trial by means of an invoice showing the sale of the revolver to him by number. Appellant contends that no sufficient foundation was laid for the introduction in evidence of this paper, but the point is valueless after what we have said concerning the identification of the pistol by means of the number on the box. We are pointed to no evidence in the record showing that the alleged two weapons were not one. This being so, no further identification was necessary, and the jury could have made but the one finding on the question.

[4] Appellant requested an instruction to the effect that the jury could not convict if any individual juror was not convinced of appellant's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt, and the request was refused. The refusal is complained of as error. It has been decided several times that such an instruction should be given, but the cases in which that rule is announced are also to the effect that a failure to give it is not reversible error, upon the theory that the instruction is "in effect simply admonitory and cautionary of the sworn duty of the jurors." People v. Singh, 20 Cal. App. 146, 128 Pac. 420; People v. Svendsen, 25 Cal. App. 1, 142 Pac. 861.

[5] Finally, appellant complains of the trial court's refusal to give two certain instructions on the question of reasonable doubt. There is evidence in the record, coming from the lips of Webster, to the effect that he sometimes kept the missing revolver in a pocket in his automobile, instead of in the place in the house from which he asserted it was taken. The requested instructions were so framed as to inform the members of the jury that they could not convict of burglary if they had a reasonable doubt upon the question whether the revolver was taken from the place in the house or from the automobile. Laying aside the contention of the Attorney General that the subject-matter of the two refused instructions was contained in instructions which were given, we are satisfied that there was no basis in the record for the two in question. While Webster did testify that he sometimes kept the gun in his car, his whole testimony on the point, taken together, is clearly and positively to the effect that at the time in question here it was in its place in the house. This is made to appear, especially, in the redirect examination of Webster by the district attorney. It was not error to refuse the two instructions.

The judgment is affirmed.

Before a broker, employed to sell real property, can be said to have earned his commission, he must have produced a purchaser ready, willing, and able to buy upon the terms set forth in the listing agreement.

2. Brokers ⟸57(1)—Owner assents to differences in contract by not rejecting offer.

Where a broker produces a purchaser ready, able, and willing to purchase land substantially on the authorized terms, and the vendor fails to reject the offer on the ground of its variance from the terms given the broker, such difference will be deemed assented to, and the broker will be entitled to his commission.

3. Brokers ⟸86(5)—Evidence held to sustain finding that purchaser was ready, able, and willing.

In an action for a commission under a contract for the sale of land, evidence held to sustain a finding that proposed purchaser was ready, willing, and able to make the purchase on the terms set forth in the listing agreement, though the broker had agreed to give purchaser 20 days within which to make the first payment.

4. Brokers ⟸42—Broker could maintain action without license, where commissioner had not been appointed.

Where commission provided by St. 1919, p. 1259, § 20, providing for real estate broker's licenses, was not appointed until two days after the breaking off of negotiations between landowner and proposed purchaser, it appearing that the constitutionality of the act was questioned by the State Comptroller and the commission was unable to establish an office until five months after its appointment landowner could not challenge the right of broker to maintain an action for his commission on the ground that he had procured no license.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; M. F. McCormick, Judge.

Action by Aram Merzoian against Peter Papazian. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Ernest Klette, E. A. Williams, and J. Geo. Ohannesian, all of Fresno, for appellant.

G. L. Aynesworth, of Fresno, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover a commission alleged to be due under a contract for the sale of real estate.

The contract was dated July 12, 1919, and it appoints the plaintiff as the exclusive agent of the defendant for the period of 20 days to sell the property described in the complaint, which consisted of 60 acres of land with improvements and certain personal property, for the sum of $40,000. By its terms the defendant was "to furnish deed and abstract showing clear title" in himself, and in the event of the plaintiff selling the property or being instrumental in bringing about a sale he was to receive as his compensation 5 per cent. of the purchase price. The terms of payment provided in said authorization were "$5,000 net cash, balance $3,000 out of 1919 crops, including interest, balance $1,500 per year and interest thereafter. * * * interest 7 per cent."

Within the 20 days specified plaintiff procured a purchaser and entered into a contract with him, receiving from the purchaser $1,000 as a deposit and part payment of the purchase price of $40,000, payable $5,000 in cash 20 days after the execution of a good and sufficient contract of sale of said property, $3,000 on or before December 15, 1919, $1,500 on or before December 15, 1920, and a like amount on or before December 15 of each and every year thereafter until complete payment of said price, with interest on all deferred payments from date of said offer at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum payable December 15, 1920, and annually thereafter.

[1] In respect to contracts with brokers to sell real property it is undoubtedly true that before the broker can be said to have earned his commission he must have produced a purchaser ready, willing, and able to buy upon the terms set forth in the listing agreement. 9 Corpus Juris, 599. And defendant here contends that the terms of the offer procured by the plaintiff differ from those contained in his authorization in at least two essential respects, so that he was warranted in rejecting the offer.

It will be noticed that according to the listing agreement $5,000 net was to be paid on the execution and delivery of a sufficient contract of sale and purchase, $3,000 out of the 1919 crop, and balance at the rate of $1,500 "per year and interest thereafter"; while the contract to purchase reads—

"$3,000 on or before December 15, 1919; $1,500 on or before December 15, 1920, and $1,500 on or before December 15th of each and every year thereafter until the entire balance of said purchase price is paid, together with interest on all deferred payments from the date hereof at the rate of 7 per cent. per annum payable December 15, 1920, and annually thereafter." It will also be observed that there is nothing in the listing contract authorizing the agent to give the purchaser "twenty days to pay said sum of $5,000."

As to the first of these claimed variances, it is apparent that the term "crop season" is indefinite as to time. It may possibly mean the period covered by the actual harvesting of the crop, and it may and probably does mean the point of time when the crop has been sold and paid for. This provision of the contract being indefinite, we are unable to say that there is any difference between the "crop season" of the year 1919 and December 15th of that year. With respect to the time of the payment of the yearly installments of $1,500, the listing agreement is ambiguous; but we are inclined to adopt the view of the trial court that such installments were to be paid yearly from the date of the $3,000 payment and not from the date of the contract of sale.

[2] But granting that these asserted differences exist, still they are of no moment, for it clearly appears that the defendant did not object to the proffered contract on these grounds. The rule is established in this state that where an agent produces a purchaser ready, able, and willing to purchase substantially upon the authorized terms, and the vendor fails to reject the offer on the ground of its variance from the terms given the broker, such difference will be deemed assented to, and the broker will be entitled to his commission. The rule of law applicable in this case is thus laid down in Cal. Land Security Co. v. Ritchie, 40 Cal. App. 246, 180 Pac. 625:

"It has been held, upon the soundest of reason, that where property is sold by a broker to a purchaser able, ready, and willing to take and pay for the property, and any of the terms of the contract as to payment, or the abstract or deed are unsatisfactory to the intending vendor, the latter should object to them on that ground and not refuse absolutely to sell; and that where he fails to make such objection under such circumstances, he will be held liable to the broker negotiating the sale for his commissions if he refuses to accept the purchaser."

[3] As to the third ground of objection to the contract, it is true that the plaintiff had no authority to give the purchaser 20 days within which to make the first payment of $5,000; and as to this variance the defendant did object. He refused to accept the $1,000 check offered to him, claiming that he was entitled to $5,000, and he demanded this sum in gold. But there is evidence tending to show that the purchaser was able to pay this sum, and offered to do so practically at once, saying, "Give me time to step out to the bank and I'll get the money for you." To this offer the defendant replied, "You need not go because I don't want to sell the property under those terms anyway." While the evidence is not strong, and appears to be subject to the criticism made of it by counsel for the defendant, we are constrained to hold that it is sufficient to sustain the finding of the court to the effect that the purchaser produced by the plaintiff was ready and willing to purchase under the terms of the listing agreement. We are also satisfied from a careful examination of the evidence that it is sufficient to support the finding of the court that the proposed purchaser was financially able to make the purchase.

[4] Finally, the defendant challenges the right of the plaintiff to maintain this action for the reason that the plaintiff had not at the time of this sale procured a real estate broker's license, as required by the statute of 1919. Stat. 1919, p. 1259, § 20. It is conceded by defendant that the commission provided for by that act was not appointed until two days after the breaking off of the negotiations between the defendant and the purchaser. It further appears that the constitutionality of the act was questioned by the State Comptroller, and for this reason the commission was unable to establish an office, and it in fact issued no licenses until about five months after its appointment. Under these circumstances it is manifest that it was impossible for the plaintiff to have procured a license at the time of this transaction, which deprives this objection of the appellant of any force.

It follows from what we have said that the judgment should be affirmed; and it is so ordered.

We concur: WASTE, P. J.; RICHARDS, J.

Appeal from Superior Court, Glenn County; Wm. M. Finch, Judge.

Action by J. Scheimer and others against D. J. James. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

Frank Freeman and George R. Freeman, both of Willows, for appellants.

W. T. Belieu and Claude Purkitt, both of Willows, for respondent.

PREWETT, Presiding Justice pro tem. On February 11, 1919, the parties to this action entered into a written contract establishing a partnership between the appellants on the one side and the respondent on the other. The purpose of the partnership was the propagation of turkeys for the market. The respondent was constituted as the active manager of the business. The appellants filed their complaint, alleging various acts of the respondent as breaches of the partnership contract, and praying an accounting and dissolution. The respondent, by way of answer and cross-complaint, admitted the existence of the partnership, denied the commission of the breaches charged against him, and alleged the destruction by appellants of several thousand turkeys by flooding the land, invading the premises with large numbers of stock, and various other alleged wrongs. He asked for $5,625, and the jury by their verdict awarded him $5,280, which sum the court subsequently reduced to $4,054. The court adopted the verdict found adversely to the appellants on the other issues, and rendered judgment accordingly.

The appellants inserted in the partnership contract certain provisions which, in effect, amount to a lease by them to the respondent or to the partnership of a tract of land, situated in the county of Glenn, containing about 3,600 acres. This leasehold portion of the contract declares that the appellants "give and demise unto the said party of the second part, certain specific rights and privileges as hereinafter mentioned to those pieces or parcels of land," etc., and describing the entire 3,600 acres. It further provides that the respondent—

"agrees to use the above-described land only as a place upon which to incubate, breed or hatch, feed and care for, and prepare for market, fowls commonly known as turkeys."

If there were no other descriptions or limitations in the contract, it would at once be seen that the appellants leased the entire tract of 3,600 acres for above purposes. There is in the contract, however, a limiting provision which reads as follows:

"That he will use diligent care to keep said turkeys off from and away from any and all crops growing on said land."

Small portions of the tract were then bearing growing crops. It is clear that it was not contemplated that the agreement to "use the above-described land" should extend to the whole of it. The respondent does not claim the whole of the tract, but contends that it was orally understood that he should have at least 160 acres thereof, embracing the portion upon which the buildings are located. He further claims that the appellants placed him in possession of the buildings and the surrounding territory, and that he remained in possession thereof until the commission of the wrongs complained of by him.

The appellants concede that respondent was entitled to a reasonable quantity of land for maintaining the turkeys, but they insist that they had a right to move him about on the premises from place to place as the exigencies of farming operations might demand. There were at one time as many as 3,500 turkeys on the place, and it is apparent that, to move these around from place to place, together with their feed, coops, pens, and shelter, and the home outfit of the manager, would be no small undertaking. During the incubating season such removal would have been impracticable, and it cannot have been contemplated by the parties.

The appellants invaded the premises with a vast array of laborers, teams, farming implements and supplies. The teams and men ran over, broke up, and destroyed many of the nests, and killed the young turkeys. The workmen flooded the premises immediately about the buildings with great quantities of flowing water in the prosecution of their operations in growing rice. This caused the drowning of large numbers of the turkeys, and destroyed the feeding grounds of the remainder. The result was the destruction of over 3,000 turkeys, though the jury charges the appellants with the destruction of but 2,400.

The verdict of the jury, the findings of the court, and the practically undisputed evidence in the case establish a most woeful disregard of the rights of the respondent and gross injury to his property. This is the outstanding fact in the case. No important questions of law or fact are involved in this appeal. Practically the entire plaint of the appellants is that the court erred in admitting evidence concerning the alleged oral understanding whereby the respondent was limited to but 160 acres, as being parol evidence to vary the terms of a written contract. This oral understanding was entered into subsequently to the execution of the written contract. In no manner whatsoever does it modify the original contract, except to surrender back to appellants all the land over and above 160 acres.

The trial court held, and in this we agree with it, that the lease conveyed to respondent the right to use the entire tract, less the portion upon which crops were growing. It thus appears that such modification as may have been effected was really a concession to appellants, and it is somewhat difficult to see how they were damaged by its proof. If this oral modification is invalid, as being in parol, the appellants are the ones who are injured by its invalidity. On the other hand, if there was error in admitting proof thereof, the respondent is the one who suffers. However, he is not complaining. He concedes and affirmatively insists that he was limited by its terms.

The appellants make the claim that the oral understanding was invalid, as being a modification of a written instrument, and therefore not provable in any event. They couple this claim with the further point that, even if the oral understanding was valid as supplying an agreement upon a matter as to which the writing was silent, still evidence is not admissible in its support, for the reason that the respondent does not set it up in his pleadings. But this position is unsound.

[1] (a) It was not error to admit evidence of the parol understanding. The respondent was entitled to at least a reasonable quantity of land. The appellants placed him in the peaceable possession of that part thereof upon which stood the buildings. This amounted to a determination by them that the respondent was entitled to that portion of the land, and to a reasonable quantity of land thereabouts. Evidence that both parties were thus willing to construe and limit the written contract, followed by the actual surrender of that portion to the respondent was admissible.

[2] (b) If there was any error in its admission, the error was harmless. It was evidence of a right to less than the written contract accorded to the respondent. A party cannot complain of a ruling which is, in fact, in his own favor.

[3] (c) The appellants admit that respondent was entitled to some part of the land, and he admits that he was not entitled to the portion thereof upon which crops were growing. If he was not entitled to all the remaining portion (which embraces a vast acreage), then it is because the written contract is silent as to quantity. If it was silent, it seems not to be disputed that the omission could be supplied by an oral agreement. The oral agreement is in no way inconsistent with the written contract, if, as appellants insist, the latter does not indicate the quantity to which the respondent was entitled. If any inconsistency can be found it is only to the effect that they were required by its terms to deliver less than they had promised.

[4] (d) The failure to plead the oral understanding is not fatal nor is it a sufficient ground upon which to predicate a reversal. Section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution provides that no case shall be reversed for mere error in pleading, unless the court can see that a miscarriage of justice has resulted therefrom. This is peculiarly a case for the application of this constitutional provision. No actual harm can have resulted to appellants by reason of this error, if error it be. The case was fully and fairly tried, no evidence was excluded by reason of the alleged defect in the pleading, and each party enjoyed all the rights that would have been his if the oral understanding had been pleaded. The actual grievance of respondent was the destruction of some thousands of turkeys, and that grievance was fully set out in the pleadings and abundantly sustained by the proofs.

The judgment is affirmed.

STAMPFLI v. STAMPFLI. (Civ. 2246.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 8, 1921.)

1. Divorce ⟹150(2)—Finding that allegations are true no sufficient finding.

Findings in a divorce case "that all the material allegations of plaintiff's complaint are true," and "that all the material allegations of the answer of defendant except as herein otherwise found are untrue," are insufficient as findings of fact.

2. Divorce ⟹135 — Finding of condonation sustained.

In action for divorce, wherein defendant in a cross-complaint set up improper conduct on the part of plaintiff wife in her relations with other men, evidence held to sustain a finding that defendant condoned the improper conduct.

3. Divorce ⟹184(10) — Finding in divorce case conclusive on appeal.

Findings of fact of trial court in divorce case on conflicting evidence are conclusive on appeal.

4. Divorce ⟹27(8) — Charges of infidelity gross cruelty.

Charging wife in presence of third persons with improper conduct with other men is gross cruelty, unless justified by the wife's misconduct.

5. Trial ⟹388(4)—No finding required of admitted fact.

No finding is required of an admitted fact.

6. Divorce ⟹150(2)—Finding of ultimate fact held sufficient.

In an action by wife for divorce on ground of extreme cruelty, consisting in part of charges of infidelity, a finding of the ultimate fact that the defendant's conduct was "without any just cause or reason or provocation," "without any just or any cause," was sufficient without any further special findings as to facts alleged in a plea of justification set up by defendant, which could have been given in evidence under the denials of his answer.

7. Divorce ⊜150(2)—Finding of residence held sufficient.

In an action for divorce, a finding "that plaintiff and defendant now are and for more than one year last past, preceding the commencement of this action, have been residents of the county," was sufficient to show that the parties were residents of the county for one year preceding the commencement of the action.

8. Divorce ⊜240(5)—Alimony held proper.

In an action for divorce, where defendant was making in excess of $100 per month, allowance of alimony in the amount of $30 a month for the support of the wife and $15 a month for the support of each of two minor children held proper.

Appeal from Superior Court, Plumas County; J. O. Moncur, Judge.

Action by Susie B. Stampfli against W. L. Stampfli. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Modified and affirmed.

L. H. Hughes, of Quincy, for appellant.
M. C. Kerr, of Quincy, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. The plaintiff was granted an interlocutory decree of divorce on the ground of extreme cruelty, and the defendant appeals. The complaint alleges many specific acts of cruelty. The answer denies some of the alleged acts, and pleads justification of those not denied. With his answer the defendant filed a cross-complaint, charging the plaintiff with extreme cruelty and specifying several instances of improper conduct on her part with one Walter Stampfli, a cousin of the defendant, in support of said charges. The plaintiff answered the cross-complaint denying the alleged improper conduct. Evidence was introduced by both parties in support of their respective allegations and denials. The testimony was of such character as to create a substantial conflict.

The findings of the court upon the charges and counter charges of cruelty are as follows:

"That all the material allegations of plaintiff's complaint are true. That it is true that since the said marriage and for more than one year prior to the commencement of this action the defendant has treated the plaintiff in a cruel and inhuman manner, and that said defendant is subject to violent fits of jealousy and anger, and while so angered, without any just cause or reason or provocation, has violently abused, insulted, and upbraided the plaintiff without any just or any cause, and has accused plaintiff falsely of intimacy with other men without any cause or foundation in fact. That defendant on many and divers occasions has applied vile, obscene, and insulting epithets and names to plaintiff in the presence of their two minor children. That there is not sufficient evidence to establish any theft by said defendant, and the court finds that there were no thefts as set forth in plaintiff's complaint. That such acts and conduct of defendant toward plaintiff has caused plaintiff grievous bodily injury. That plaintiff was guilty of misconduct with one Walter Stampfli, not amounting to adultery, but that said conduct was condoned by defendant prior to the commencement of this action and was not repeated. * * * That all the material allegations of the answer of defendant except as herein otherwise found are untrue. That all of the material allegations set forth in the cross-complaint of defendant except as herein otherwise found are untrue. That it is not true that since the said marriage that plaintiff has treated defendant in a cruel and inhuman manner, and has inflicted on defendant great and grievous mental suffering and anguish, and it is not true that any acts, conduct, and behavior of plaintiff caused defendant great mental anguish and suffering, or has seriously impaired his health. That there was misconduct on the part of plaintiff, but that the same has been fully condoned prior to the commencement of this action. That all the material allegations of the answer of plaintiff to defendant's cross-complaint except as herein otherwise found are true."

[1] The appellant contends that the findings are insufficient to support the interlocutory decree. The findings "that all the material allegations of plaintiff's complaint are true," and "that all the material allegations of the answer of defendant except as herein otherwise found are untrue," are clearly insufficient as findings of fact, and must be dismissed from consideration in determining the question under discussion. On appeal a party is entitled to contest the decision of the trial court that any particular fact in issue is material. Obviously this right would be denied an appellant if a finding that all "material" allegations are true or untrue were held sufficient. There would be no means by which the appellate court could ascertain what facts the trial court held to be material. In the case of Ladd v. Tully, 51 Cal. 277, in passing upon the sufficiency of a similar finding it was said:

"The finding is that all the 'material' facts stated in the complaint are true. But we have no means of determining what facts the court deemed 'material,' and have no information from the findings on this point. So loose a method of finding the facts cannot be tolerated, and would lead to the most serious perplexities."

See, also, Krug v. F. A. Lux Brewing Co., 129 Cal. 323, 61 Pac. 1125.

"The general omnibus finding 'that all the material denials and averments of the answer to the complaint herein are true, and all the material averments of the amended complaint in intervention are true,' is insufficient for any purpose." Holt Mfg. Co. v. Collins, 154 Cal. 276, 97 Pac. 520.

[2, 3] The court did not make specific findings upon the particular facts alleged in the cross-complaint, but found generally "that plaintiff was guilty of misconduct with one Walter Stampfli, not amounting to adultery." The court further found that "said conduct was condoned by defendant prior to the commencement of this action, and was not repeated." This further finding is supported by the evidence. The most serious acts of misconduct occurred, according to the defendant's testimony, on the evening of September 20, 1919. The defendant's testimony relative to subsequent events on the same evening is as follows:

"I told her I would overlook it this time but I didn't want it to happen again. So after we had got into bed, she put her arms around my neck and started to cry. She says, 'Dutch, you won't like me no more, will you?' I says, 'Yes, Suz, I will overlook it this time, but don't let me ever see it happen again.' "

In response to questions propounded by the court the defendant testified that, after the occurrences of September 20th, he and the plaintiff continued to live together as husband and wife up to September 28th, and "got along fine" "never had a word," and that there was no repetition of her conduct with Walter Stampfli. The plaintiff did not plead condonation. In Hunter v. Hunter, 132 Cal. 476, 64 Pac. 773, it is said:

"As condonation is a specific defense to an action for divorce, it should be pleaded like any other defense. It is true that an action for divorce differs from an ordinary proceeding, in that a decree may not be rendered upon the admission of a party, or upon the uncorroborated evidence of either of the spouses. If, therefore, the evidence had shown condonation, it would have been the duty of the court, even without a pleading, to have found to that effect."

Appellant urges that plaintiff failed to comply with the condition subsequent of treating the defendant with conjugal kindness, though admitting that there was no further act of improper conduct with Walter Stampfli. The evidence bearing upon the subsequent conduct of the plaintiff was conflicting, and the court's finding is therefore conclusive.

[4-6] It is alleged in the complaint and admitted in the answer that in July, 1918, the defendant told the plaintiff that he was going to leave her, and did leave their home with his suit case; that he carried his suit case around the town of Crescent Mills, and told several persons that he was going away; that in September, 1919, the defendant, in the presence of their minor children and said Walter Stampfli, accused the plaintiff of having had sexual relations with said Stampfli. The defendant pleads justification of his conduct by alleging that at that time he had gone home and found the plaintiff and said Stampfli in a room together, "caressing, embracing, and kissing each other." It is alleged that at the same time the defendant shoved the plaintiff in a violent manner. The defendant admits that he shoved the plaintiff out of the way in an endeavor to see said Walter Stampfli who, he alleges, was hiding in the room. It is alleged and admitted that on that occasion the defendant looked for his rifle and pistol, but defendant denies that he threatened to use the same or to injure the plaintiff. It is further alleged and admitted that, on the 28th of September, 1919, the defendant accused the plaintiff, in the presence of her sister-in-law and the latter's minor children and within the hearing of a number of persons on the street, of having had sexual relations with said Walter Stampfli, and that he made the same charge against the plaintiff to her mother. The defendant attempts to justify his conduct by alleging that such statements were made in the heat of a quarrel provoked by the plaintiff, and which became violent on the part of both; that on that occasion the plaintiff had gone to the defendant's shop and "started to upbraid and criticize him, and continued to upbraid him to such an extent that he finally referred" to the occurrences of September 20th, involving plaintiff's conduct with said Stampfli. The defendant's conduct, expressly admitted by him, is sufficient to constitute gross cruelty unless justified by the plaintiff's misconduct. No finding is required of an admitted fact. It only remained to find upon the plea of justification. The court found that the defendant's conduct was "without any just cause or reason or provocation"; "without any just or any cause"; that his accusations of infidelity were "without any cause or foundation in fact." Under the authorities these findings are sufficient. The plea of justification did not present any new issue, as the facts alleged could have been given in evidence under the denials of the answer, and it was not necessary to find specially as to such facts. The court found the ultimate fact that there was no cause or provocation for the defendant's conduct. Terrill v. Terrill, 109 Cal. 413, 42 Pac. 137; Howard v. Howard, 134 Cal. 346, 66 Pac. 367; Kepfler v. Kepfler, 134 Cal. 205, 66 Pac. 208.

[7] Appellant contends that the findings do not show that the parties were residents of the county for one year preceding the commencement of the action, citing Coleman v. Coleman, 23 Cal. App. 424, 138 Pac. 363. In that case the finding held insufficient recited that the parties "have been residents in said city and county and state for a period of more than one year now last past." In this case the finding is "that plaintiff and defendant now are and for more than one year last past, preceding the commencemnt of this action, have been residents of the county of Plumas, state of California." The difference between the two findings is apparent.

[8] Appellant objects to the findings as insufficient to support the allowance of $30 a month for the support of the wife and $15 a month for the support of each of the two minor children. The court finds that said sums are reasonable sums to be paid for the support of the wife and children, and that the defendant is an able-bodied man, and able to earn sufficient to pay the sums allowed. The plaintiff alleges in her complaint that the defendant is making in excess of $100 per month. The defendant does not deny this allegation, but alleges that since the marriage of the parties he has been "continuously" employed at "good wages." The finding is sufficient under the circumstances disclosed.

[9] The interlocutory decree awarded the plaintiff $150 as attorney's fees. The court is not authorized to allow attorney's fees for past services. Loveren v. Loveren, 100 Cal. 494, 35 Pac. 87; Lacey v. Lacey, 108 Cal. 46, 40 Pac. 1056; Wickland v. Wickland, 19 Cal. App. 562, 126 Pac. 507; Sheppard v. Sheppard, 15 Cal. App. 619, 115 Pac. 751. The judgment is modified by striking therefrom the allowance of $150 attorney's fees, and, as so modified, is affirmed, neither party to recover costs of appeal.

3. Embezzlement ⊂⊃8—Contractor cannot be guilty with respect to money paid him under contract and which is his own property.

Under Pen. Code, § 503, defining embezzlement as the fraudulent appropriation of property by one to whom it has been intrusted, a building contractor cannot be guilty of embezzling money paid him under the contract, all of which is his own property, as a person's own property is not property intrusted to him.

4. Embezzlement ⊂⊃10—Contractor not guilty of embezzling money paid him under contract, though agreeing to pay for labor and materials.

Under Pen. Code, § 506, as amended by St. 1907, p. 892, providing that every person intrusted with property for the use of any other person who fraudulently appropriates it to his own use, etc., and any contractor who appropriates money paid him for any use or purpose other than that for which he received it is guilty of embezzlement, a building contractor receiving money under the contract, which required him to pay all claims for labor or materials, and orally agreeing to use the money in payment of labor and materials, was not guilty of embezzlement in using the money for other purposes, as the money was not properly intrusted to him or in his control for the use of any other person.

5. Constitutional law ⊂⊃83(3)—Legislation, penalizing the use of money except for payment of debts, is invalid.

Any legislation that makes it a crime for one to use his own money for any purpose other than the payment of his debts violates Const. art. 1, § 15, prohibiting imprisonment for debt except in case of fraud.

6. Constitutional law ⊂⊃83(3)—Nonpayment of debt cannot be made a crime.

Const. art. 1, § 15, prohibiting imprisonment for debt in civil actions, cannot be evaded by making the nonpayment of a debt a crime.

7. Constitutional law ⊂⊃83(3)—Statute punishing contractor for using money paid him violates provision against imprisonment for debt.

Pen. Code, § 506, as amended by St. 1919, p. 1090, providing that a contractor appropriating money paid him for any use or purpose other than that for which he received it is guilty of embezzlement, and that the payment of laborers and materialmen is thereby declared to be the use and purpose to which the contract price received by the contractor shall be applied, if construed as making it embezzlement for a contractor to break his agreement to pay for labor and materials with moneys paid him under the contract, though the title to the moneys is vested in him, violates Const. art. 1, § 15, prohibiting imprisonment for debt.

8. Constitutional law ⊂⊃87, 89(1), 206(1), 258—Statute providing that contractor holds money in trust abridges privileges of citizens, denies due process, and infringes right of property and right to contract.

Pen. Code, § 506, as amended by St. 1919, p. 1090, relative to embezzlement by contractors, if construed to mean that, notwithstanding the provisions of the contract to the contrary, the contractor does not have the absolute unconditional title to money paid him thereunder, but holds it in trust for the payment of laborers and materialmen, abridges the privileges of citizens of the United States, deprives them of property without due process of law, in violation of Const. U. S. Amend. 14, and Const. Cal. art. 1, § 13, and violates Const. Cal. art. 1, § 1, declaring that all men had the inalienable right of acquiring, possessing, and protecting property, and infringes upon the inalienable right of contract.

9. Constitutional law ⊂⊃89(1)—Right to contract cannot be limited.

The right to make contracts common to all legitimate vocations is a property right, the enjoyment of which is guaranteed by the Constitution, and though the Legislature may prescribe the form in which contracts shall be executed in order to be valid or binding, it cannot limit the right of the parties to incorporate into their contracts, otherwise valid, such terms as may be mutually satisfactory to them.

10. Constitutional law ⊂⊃81—Statute requiring contractor to hold moneys in trust not valid exercise of police power.

Pen. Code, § 506, as amended by St. 1919, p. 1090, construed as requiring building contractors to hold moneys received under the contract in trust for the payment of laborers and materialmen, is not a valid exercise of the police power, as there can be nothing so injurious to the public welfare in the failure of a debtor to pay his debts as to require the exercise of the police power.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frederick W. Houser, Judge.

W. H. Holder was convicted of embezzlement, and from the judgment and orders denying motions for a new trial and in arrest of judgment he appeals. Judgment and order denying new trial reversed, and appeal from order denying motion in arrest of judgment dismissed. For the allegations of the indictment, see 192 Pac. 90.

John S. Cooper, M. G. Phillips, and Cooper, Collings & Shreve, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Arthur Keetch, Deputy Atty. Gen., and John W. Maltman, of Los Angeles, for the People.

FINLAYSON, P. J. [1] Defendant, who was convicted of embezzlement under an indictment in two counts, similar in form, appeals from the judgment and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. He likewise appeals from an order denying his motion in arrest of judgment, but, as that order is not appealable, the appeal therefrom must be dismissed.

The evidence discloses that appellant, as contractor, had entered into a building contract with each of two lot owners for the construction of a house. Each instrument provided for a contract price to be paid appellant. Certain sums, parts of the stipulated contract price, were paid appellant under each contract, but, instead of expending the money for labor and materials, he appropriated to other uses amounts which, the prosecution claims, should have gone for those purposes. The aggregate amounts so appropriated were, in one instance, $1,500, in the other, $2,670. These two amounts are the sums mentioned in the respective counts of the indictment.

The indictment has heretofore been before this court on an application for a writ of habeas corpus. Ex parte Holder, 192 Pac. 90. The ground there taken by appellant, as petitioner for the writ, was that each count of the indictment charged an offense under Penal Code, § 506, as amended in 1919 (Stats. 1919, p. 1090), and that that section, as so amended, is unconstitutional. We then decided, without determining whether offenses were charged under section 506, that the indictment was sufficient to charge offenses under section 503 of the same Code.

In presenting his argument for a reversal of the judgment, appellant returns to the line of attack adopted by him in the habeas corpus proceeding, contending for the unconstitutionality of section 506 as amended in 1919. The Attorney General declines to follow that argument, and insists upon an affirmance on the ground that under the evidence offenses have been proven under section 503.

[2, 3] The court did not err in overruling the demurrer to the indictment. For the reasons stated in the habeas corpus proceeding (192 Pac. 90), each count is sufficient to warrant a conviction under section 503, and appellant was properly convicted if the evidence adduced at the trial suffices to show a violation of that section. We think it clear, however, that under the evidence appellant is not guilty of the crime of embezzlement defined in section 503 of the Penal Code. The moneys which it is claimed were embezzled were paid to appellant under his respective contracts with the lot owners. No part of the money thus paid to him was the property of another. It was appellant's own property, and his only. Appellant, therefore, could not justly be found guilty under section 503, which defines embezzlement as the "fraudulent appropriation of property by a person to whom it has been intrusted." In no true sense of the words can it be said that that which is absolutely one's own is property that "has been intrusted" to him. As the crime of embezzlement is ordinarily understood and defined, one cannot be guilty of embezzling his own property. People v. Goodrich, 138 Cal. 472, 71 Pac. 509; 20 Corp. Jur. 416. The question, therefore, is: Does the evidence justify appellant's conviction under section 506 as it now stands? And if it does, is that section, as thus amended, a valid and constitutional enactment?

The following is the language of section 506 as it now reads:

"Every trustee, banker, merchant, broker, attorney, agent, assignee in trust, executor, administrator, or collector, or person otherwise intrusted with or having in his control property for the use of any other person, who fraudulently appropriates it to any use or purpose not in the due and lawful execution of his trust, or secretes it with a fraudulent intent to appropriate it to such use or purpose, and any contractor who appropriates money paid to him for any use or purpose, other than for that which he received it, is guilty of embezzlement, and the payment of laborers and materialmen for work performed or material furnished in the performance of any contract is hereby declared to be the use and purpose to which the contract price of such contract, or any part thereof, received by the contractor shall be applied."

That part of the section which provides that "any contractor who appropriates money paid to him for any use or purpose, other than for that which he received it, is guilty of embezzlement," was added in 1907. Stats. 1907, p. 892. In 1919 the Legislature added to the section the concluding sentence, that providing that—

"The payment of laborers and materialmen for work performed or material furnished in the performance of any contract is hereby declared to be the use and purpose to which the contract price of such contract, or any part thereof, received by the contractor shall be applied." Stats. 1919, page 1090.

[4] It is quite evident that appellant could not rightfully be convicted of embezzlement under section 506 as it read prior to the amendment of 1907. For, since the money, when paid to him, was paid to and received by him under his contract with the lot owner —it was so stated, without contradiction, by the witnesses on both sides—the money was not property intrusted to him or in his control "for the use of any other person." By his contract with each lot owner he did, it is true, expressly agree to "pay all claims of all persons performing labor upon, or furnishing materials for said work or buildings." And at the time when the several sums were paid to him he orally agreed to use them in the payment of labor and material bills. But there is no claim that appellant procured the payment of these sums by fraudulent misrepresentations. That is not the theory upon which the indictment was drawn. The prosecution's theory is that, notwithstanding the moneys, when paid to appellant, were, under the terms and provisions of the building contracts, his own property, he, nevertheless, was guilty of embezzlement under section 506 as it now reads. Though he may have agreed to pay certain of his debts with the moneys that were paid to him under his contract, the title to the moneys so received by him, if the terms of his contract alone be considered, was vested in him absolutely and unconditionally.

It follows from the foregoing that to hold appellant guilty of embezzlement it must be held: (1) That, by reason of the amendment of 1907, a contractor who breaches his agreement to pay certain of his debts with the moneys paid him under his contract is guilty of embezzlement, notwithstanding the title to the moneys is vested in him; or (2) that the amendment of 1919 is constitutional, and that its provisions so enter into and become a part of every building contract that, the terms of such contract to the contrary notwithstanding, the money paid to the contractor under his contract does not become his own property, but is held by him in trust for the uses and purposes mentioned in the 1919 amendment. In our opinion the Legislature is without the power to do either of these things. That is, the Legislature has not the power to provide that a contractor who breaches his agreement to pay a certain class of debts with money that is his own shall, for that reason alone, be deemed guilty of a crime punishable with imprisonment. Nor has it the power so to interfere with the right of contract as to provide, in effect, that money paid to a contractor under his contract shall not be absolutely his own property to do with as he pleases, but shall be received by him in trust to pay a certain favored class of creditors.

[5, 6] Any legislation that makes it a crime for one to use his own money for any purpose other than the payment of his debts is violative of section 15 of article I of the Constitution of this state, which expressly inhibits imprisonment for debt except in cases of fraud. Ex parte Crane, 26 Cal. App. 22, 145 Pac. 733; Ex parte Hollman, 79 S. C. 9, 60 S. E. 19, 21 L. R. A. (N. S.) 242, 14 Ann. Cas. 1105; State v. Paint, etc., Co., 92 Tenn. 81, 20 S. W. 499, 36 Am. St. Rep. 68; State v. Williams, 150 N. C. 802, 63 S. E. 949; Peonage Cases (D. C.) 123 Fed. 685 et seq. The provision in the California Constitution inhibiting imprisonment for debt "in civil actions" cannot be evaded by making the nonpayment of a debt a crime. State v. Paint, etc., Co., supra. See, also, Ex parte Crane, supra; Carr v. State, 106 Ala. 38, 17 South. 350, 34 L. R. A. 634, 54 Am. St. Rep. 19; Kansas City v. Pengilley, 269 Mo. 59, 189 S. W. 380, L. R. A. 1917B, 551. In the Peonage Cases, Judge Jones, in a forceful opinion, very pertinently says that—

"When a man's liberties are taken from him because he does not pay a debt, and he is punished if he does not perform a civil contract, * * * he is put in prison bounds, and is imprisoned for debt in the meaning of the Constitution." 123 Fed. 686.

In Ex parte Hollman, supra, the court uses this language:

"It is strenuously argued, however, that the act does not provide for imprisonment for debt under civil process, and that the General Assembly may make an act criminal and punishable by imprisonment which is not fraudulent nor recognized as morally wrong. The power of the General Assembly to make an act criminal which was before innocent is familiar. But the legislative power to make acts criminal and punishable by imprisonment cannot be extended to an invasion of the rights guaranteed the citizens by the Constitution. It is impossible to frame a valid statute punishing by imprisonment the exercise of the right to religious liberty, or the right to petition for the redress of grievances, or the right to be exempt from imprisonment for debt except in case of fraud. These are all constitutional rights which cannot be abridged under the guise of legislation against crime. The exercise of them cannot be crime."

[7] It follows, therefore, that the judgment cannot be upheld upon the theory that, notwithstanding the title to the money paid to appellant under his contract was vested in him, he, nevertheless, could be found guilty of embezzlement because he breached his agreement to use the money to pay certain of his bills.

[8] The sole remaining theory upon which the people may attempt to justify appellant's conviction is that, by reason of the amendment of 1919, the statute itself so enters into and becomes a part of every building contract that, the provisions of the contract to the contrary notwithstanding, the absolute, unconditional title to money paid to the contractor under his contract does not pass to him, but is received by him in trust for certain uses. A statute that consummates such a result abridges the privileges of citizens of the United States and deprives them of property without due process of law. All men have the inalienable right of "acquiring, possessing and protecting" property (Const. Cal. art. I, § 1); and no person shall be deprived of property "without due process of law" (Cal. Const. art. I, § 13; and Fourteenth Amendment). The right of property antedates all Constitutions. Every person has the right to enjoy his property and improve it according to his own desires in any way consistent with the rights of others. This right is invaded if he is not at liberty to contract with others respecting the manner in which and the terms upon which his property shall be improved. The Legislature, therefore, cannot, without invading such right of the property owner, declare that he shall not contract with a builder upon such terms that all moneys paid the latter for his work and skill shall be absolutely his own. And, conversely, the Legislature cannot thus limit the right of contract without invading the contractor's inalienable right to dispose of his labor and skill upon such terms as may be mutually agreeable to himself and the owner of the property.

A man's constitutional liberty means more than his personal freedom. It means, with many other rights, his right freely to labor and to own the fruits of his toil. A statute that, in its practical operation, in effect declares that under any contract between the owner of property and a building contractor the payments that may be made to the latter shall not be absolutely his own to do with as he pleases, but shall be held by him in trust to pay debts due by him to certain preferred creditors, is unconstitutional, in that it is an infringement upon the inalienable right of contract.

[9] The right to make contracts, common to all legitimate vocations, is a property right, the enjoyment of which is guaranteed by the Constitution; and though the Legislature may prescribe the form in which contracts shall be executed in order that they may be valid or binding, it cannot limit the right of the parties to incorporate into their contracts, otherwise valid, such terms as may be mutually satisfactory to them. Stimson Mill Co. v. Braun, 136 Cal. 122, 68 Pac. 481, 57 L. R. A. 726, 89 Am. St. Rep. 116; Gibbs v. Tally, 133 Cal. 373, 65 Pac. 970, 60 L. R. A. 815; Shaughnessy v. American Sur. Co., 138 Cal. 543, 69 Pac. 250, 71 Pac. 701; Snell v. Bradbury, 139 Cal. 379, 73 Pac. 150; Roystone Co. v. Darling, 171 Cal. 532, 154 Pac. 15; Binford v. Boyd, 178 Cal. 458, 174 Pac. 56; Kelly v. Johnson, 251 Ill. 135, 95 N. E. 1068, 36 L. R. A. (N. S.) 573; George Bolln Co. v. North Platte, etc., Irr. Co., 19 Wyo. 542, 121 Pac. 22, 39 L. R. A. (N. S.) 868.

[10] The right of contract is, it is true, subject to reasonable police regulation. But the amendment of 1919 is not a valid exercise of that power. As said by Mr. Justice Henshaw in the Jentzsch Case, 112 Cal. 473, 44 Pac. 804, 32 L. R. A. 664:

"While the police power is one whose proper use makes most potently for good, in its undefined scope and inordinate exercise lurks no small danger to the republic, for the difficulty which is experienced in defining its just limits and bounds affords a temptation to the Legislature to encroach upon the rights of citizens with experimental laws, none the less dangerous because well meant."

It is well settled that the police power cannot be made a cloak under which to overthrow or disregard constitutional rights. It is only when the general welfare, the interests of the public as distinguished from those of individuals, will be protected that the right of contract may be limited by a general exercise of the police power. Binford v. Boyd, supra; In re Farb, 178 Cal. 592, 174 Pac. 320, 3 A. L. R. 301. In view of this principle, impregnably established in our jurisprudence, it cannot successfully be contended that the amendment in question is a valid police regulation. The payment of debts that may be due laborers or materialmen is not calculated to conserve the safety, health, or general welfare of the community. There can be nothing so injurious to the public welfare in the failure of a debtor to pay his just debts as to require an exercise of the police power. In all free governments the good sense of mankind, since the day when imprisonment for debt was abolished, has condemned and frowned down any attempt to coerce the performance of civil obligations by criminal penalties. Gibbs v. Tally, supra; Ex parte Dickey, 144 Cal. 234, 77 Pac. 924, 66 L. R. A. 928, 103 Am. St. Rep. 82, 1 Ann. Cas. 428; Binford v. Boyd, supra; Ex parte Hayden, 147 Cal. 649, 82 Pac. 315, 1 L. R. A. (N. S.) 184, 109 Am. St. Rep. 183; Peonage Cases, supra; Bailey v. Alabama, 219 U. S. 219, 31 Sup. Ct. 145, 55 L. Ed. 191; Kansas City v. Pengilley, supra; Toney v. State, 141 Ala. 120, 37 South. 332, 67 L. R. A. 286, 109 Am. St. Rep. 23, 3 Ann. Cas. 319; State v. Armstead, 103 Miss. 790, 60 South. 778, Ann. Cas. 1915B, 495.

For these reasons we hold that the amendment of 1907 is an unwarranted invasion of the rights guaranteed by our state and federal Constitutions, and that therefore the clause added to section 506 by the amendment of 1919 is void and wholly ineffective. This being so, the judgment must be reversed, for the reason that, under the evidence, appellant has not been shown to have violated either section 503 or section 506, shorn of its unconstitutional provisions.

The judgment and order denying appellant's motion for a new trial are reversed. The appeal from the order denying appellant's motion in arrest of judgment is dismissed.

BAR ASS'N OF SAN FRANCISCO v. GOLDMAN. (Civ. 3801.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. June 2, 1921.)

1. Attorney and client ⇐53(2)—Evidence held insufficient to support disbarment of attorney.

Evidence held insufficient to support the disbarment of an attorney for alleged moral turpitude in presenting a false satisfaction in writing to the State Industrial Commission and in giving false testimony before such commission as to the genuineness of such writing.

2. Attorney and client ⇐53(2)—Charges of misconduct by an attorney must be supported by convincing proof.

A disbarment proceeding is quasi criminal, and charges of misconduct must be supported by convincing proof, satisfying the court with reasonable certainty.

Application by the Bar Association of San Francisco for the disbarment of Heim Goldman, an attorney at law. Accusation dismissed.

Edwin L. Forster and Franklin T. Poore, both of San Francisco, for applicant.

Vincent Surr and Douglas A. Nye, both of San Francisco, for accused.

PER CURIAM. This is an application by the Bar Association of San Francisco to remove and disbar defendant as an attorney and counselor-at-law. Two charges are contained in the accusation: (1) Moral turpitude of the accused in filing with the Industrial Accident Commission a document purporting to be a satisfaction and release in full of an award made by such commission, together with a demand for entry of such satisfaction thereon, whereas said award was not satisfied in full but only a part paid thereon; (2) moral turpitude of the accused in testifying under oath before said commission as having paid the award in full, whereas he only paid a part thereof.

[1] The facts giving rise to the accusation may be summarized as follows: On the 17th day of January, 1917, one P. J. Healy, a carpenter, was working on a building owned by I. Goldman, the father of the accused, and during the course of such employment Healy claimed that he sustained certain injuries to his knee. Demand was made by Healy upon Goldman for damages, whereupon Goldman in settlement of the claim paid the hospital and other expenses incurred by Healy, together with certain sums of money, amounting in all to over $300. Notwithstanding this settlement Healy thereafter made further demands upon Goldman who agreed to pay some further sum, but before the matter could be adjusted Healy filed with the industrial accident commission his written claim for compensation for the injuries alleged to have been received. The accused filed an answer on behalf of his father, and thereafter represented him throughout the proceedings before said commission. Healy recovered an award in the sum of $1,290, less the sum of $203, that Goldman was given credit for, leaving a balance of $1,087. Thereafter and upon receiving information from Healy's physician and nurse that the injury complained of had not been suffered by Healy upon the occasion claimed, but at some previous time, Goldman filed a petition for rehearing before the commission. The petition was granted, but the commission upon rehearing refused to disturb the original finding. Thereafter and upon the conclusion of the case before the commission the accused, as attorney for his father, filed with the Industrial Accident Commission a written document signed by Healy entitled "Satisfaction of Judgment." It was recited therein that payment of the full sum of $1,087 had been made by I. Goldman to Healy in accordance with the award. Thereafter Healy filed an affidavit with the commission, stating that he had in fact settled the case for $800, and had only received that sum instead of $1,087, the amount of the award, and that he had been advised by his attorneys not to regard the settlement as conclusive, and requested that the satisfaction be set aside. The commission set the matter for hearing, upon which occasion the accused testified that he had paid Healy the full sum of $1,087. The commission determined the question adversely to Goldman's contention, and in the exercise of the paternal supervision granted to it under the statute set the satisfaction of judgment aside and awarded Healy the further sum of $287.

The record in the case was thereafter transmitted to the grievance committee of San Francisco Bar Association. Nothing was done by this committee for a considerable length of time until finally in 1920 the committee voted to recommend disbarment proceedings against the accused, and accordingly this accusation was filed in February, 1921, containing the two charges hereinabove recited. Upon the hearing of the charges Healy, notwithstanding his verified acknowledgment that he had been paid the full amount of the award, again testified that the accused had only paid him $800, and that such payment was made in the presence of one C. C. Clark. The accused, to the contrary, testified positively that he paid the full amount of $1,087. There is therefore a direct conflict in the testimony of these parties which is impossible of reconciliation. Recourse must be had, therefore, to the other evidence for a possible solution of the issue.

It may be said at the outset that the testimony of the witness C. C. Clark is unreliable. It appears in evidence that his character was impeached upon the hearing before the Industrial Accident Commission. It was there testified to that he was a vendor of worthless stock and that his reputation for truth was bad. It here appears that he was an intermeddler, carrying tales between Goldman and Healy for the manifest purpose of stirring up strife and litigation between them in the hope of reward. The evidence shows that he sought sums of money from both sides to arbitrate their differences. It further shows that he informed Healy that the Goldmans had made threats against his life and would litigate the case for years unless he settled the same. On the other hand, he informed I. Goldman that Healy would have him indicted, and further that he would sue him for $50,000 and have his son disbarred unless he settled with Healy. These statements so far as the Goldmans were concerned were false. It further appears in evidence that Clark attempted to discourage a witness from testifying before the Industrial Accident Commission, informing such witness that the controversy was between a working man and a rich concern, and that his testimony should not for that reason be against Healy. Under these circumstances the testimony of this witness is certainly discredited. Nor is the testimony of Healy convincing or sufficient to overcome the sworn statement made by him that he received the full amount of the award. In relating the circumstances under which the payment was made both he and Clark testified to the same effect as to certain minor details, some of which were subsequently admitted by Healy to be incorrect. This circumstance strongly indicates a rehearsed story. In contrast to this evidence the testimony of the accused is without contradiction, and is supported by facts and circumstances and presents every appearance of verity. The evidence shows that upon settling the matter he accounted to his father, charging him with the full amount of $1,087. The father testified that he paid this full sum, and his testimony carries conviction. In addition thereto a witness who saw the money paid testified that on that occasion the accused mentioned to Healy the exact sum he was receiving, the amount being paid in cash for the reason that Healy refused to take a check.

[2] We do not deem further discussion of the evidence necessary. The fact that the Industrial Accident Commission refused to accept the statement of the accused as true is not controlling here. A proceeding for disbarment is quasi criminal in its nature. An attorney should not be disbarred on testimony of a doubtful character. The charges should be clearly sustained by convincing proof, which proof must satisfy a court with reasonable certainty, and any doubt arising, as in the present case, should be resolved in favor of the accused.

It might be said in conclusion that the highest evidence as to the good moral character and reputation of accused has been here presented, and he is entitled to the benefit of this proof.

From what has been said it follows that the accusation should be, and it is hereby, dismissed.

53 Cal. App. 132

DWIGHT v. CALLAGHAN et al. (Civ. 3783.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. June 9, 1921.)

1. Sales ⊂=62—Contract held not severable, and failure to make deliveries constituted breach of entire agreement.

A contract for the sale of 200,000 oil cases, shipments to commence about 30 days from the day of the contract and the order to be completed at the rate of 15,000 to 25,000 cases monthly as ordered, was not severable as to the deliveries to be made thereunder, and the buyer's averment of a breach of the entire agreement was supported by evidence of the seller's failure to make shipments of any portion of the monthly installments, though the time had not arrived for delivery of some of the installments.

2. Evidence ⊂=142(1)—Sales ⊂=417—Price paid for substitute goods some evidence of market value; buyer held to have sufficiently proved damages from seller's default.

Where a buyer, on the seller's failure to deliver, went into the open market and purchased goods as nearly similar in form and quality as possible to those prescribed in the contract at the best obtainable prices, proof of the prices paid was some evidence of market value in the market nearest the place of delivery and, in connection with the testimony of qualified witnesses as to the market price, complied with Civ. Code, §§ 3308, and 3354, as to the damages for the seller's breach.

3. Sales ⊂=172—War conditions held not to excuse performance as act of public enemy.

The existence of war conditions rendering it difficult for a seller of oil cases to procure the particular wood out of which they were to be made, due to the fact that the United States government was requiring and commandeering a large amount of the same material for use in making aeroplanes did not excuse performance under Civ. Code, § 1511, providing that the want of performance of an obligation is excused when prevented by the act of public enemies.

4. Sales ⊂=422—Finding that seller breached agreement held sufficient without express finding on special defenses.

In an action for a seller's breach of contract, where there was no tangible evidence to support the special defenses that the time for performance had been extended, and that performance had been waived, a finding that defendants breached their agreement was sufficient without any express finding on such defenses, as the finding made negatived those defenses.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Geo. A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action by Ward A. Dwight, doing business as the Dwight Lumber Company, against Charles W. Callaghan and another, copartners, etc. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

C. W. Durbrow, F. M. Parcells, and Albert Michelson, all of San Francisco, for appellants.

Stoney, Rouleau, Stoney & Palmer, and R. M. J. Armstrong, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in the plaintiff's favor for the sum of $13,955.92 damages for the alleged breach of an agreement for the sale and delivery by defendants to plaintiff of 200,000 inflammable oil cases of certain specified sizes and qualities. The agreement was in the form of an order by plaintiff of the cases in question dated May 28, 1917, and accepted by the defendants on that date. It contained the following clause as to the delivery of the goods, namely, "shipments to commence about thirty days from date, and order to be completed at the rate of 15,000 to 25,000 cases monthly as buyer may order." The complaint set forth the order in terms in the form of an exhibit, and alleged a total breach thereof on the part of the defendants, and that by reason of such failure and refusal on their part to fulfill the terms of said order the plaintiff was obliged from time to time to purchase similar oil cases in the open market at an increased price, whereby he sustained the damages which he sought by this action to recover. The defendants in their answer admitted making the agreement in the form and terms exhibited or embodied in the plaintiff's complaint, and further admitted that they had never shipped to said plaintiff any portion of the 200,000 oil cases called for by said order or any oil cases whatever. They denied for want of information and belief that the plaintiff purchased in the open market any oil cases, or that if he purchased the same he did so at the lowest market price at which they could be obtained; and denied that the plaintiff suffered any damage by reason of the defendants' failure to fulfill his said order. They then proceeded in their said order to set forth three separate special defenses to the plaintiff's action. The first of these was that they were delayed and prevented from executing the plaintiff's said order by the acts of a public enemy of the state of California and of the United States, which rendered it impossible for them to procure the necessary spruce lumber required by the terms of plaintiff's said order. The second special defense was that the plaintiff extended the period for the defendants' compliance with the terms of said order to a time subsequent to the institution of his action; and the third special defense upon which the defendants relied was that the plaintiff waived the performance of the covenants in said order to be by the defendants performed. They also pleaded by way of cross-complaint that the plaintiff was indebted to them in the sum of $1,022.10 for certain goods, wares, and merchandise sold and delivered to him. To this cross-complaint the plaintiff presented an answer pleading payment of the sum demanded therein in full. Upon the trial of the cause the trial court found in favor of the plaintiff upon all of the issues tendered by his complaint, and also found that the defendants were entitled to recover the sum of $77.43 as a balance due upon their cross-complaint, and it accordingly rendered judgment in the plaintiff's favor for the sum of $14,033.35, less the sum of $77.43 found to be due defendants upon their cross-complaint. The court made no specific findings upon the aforesaid special defenses in the defendants' answer.

[1] The first contention of the appellants upon this appeal is that the contract was as to the deliveries to be made thereunder severable, and hence that the failure of the defendants to make the earlier deliveries required by its terms did not constitute a total breach of the agreement so as to entitle the plaintiff to recover damages as to those deliveries to be made thereunder, the time for which had not arrived at the date of the institution of this action. We are unable to agree with this contention. This case is in that regard in no material respect different from the case of Los Angeles Gas & Electric Co. v. Amalgamated Oil Co., 156 Cal. 776, 106 Pac. 55, wherein the Supreme Court say:

"While there is some conflict among the decided cases, the great weight of authority, at least in the United States, supports the proposition that such agreements are entire and that a refusal without sufficient cause by the seller to furnish, or by the buyer to take or pay for, any installment, justifies a repudiation of the contract by the party not in default."

Following this precedent we are constrained to hold that the plaintiff's averment of a breach of the entire agreement is supported by the evidence showing the failure on the part of the defendants to make shipments of any portion of the monthly installments of material called for by the terms of their agreement.

[2] The next contention of the appellants is that the plaintiff proved and the court applied an improper rule for the admeasurement of damages for the defendants' breach of their agreement. In so far as this contention is based upon the claim that the contract had not been totally breached at the time the action was brought, it is answered by the conclusions above arrived at as to the defendants' total breach of their agreement. As to the measure of damages for such breach the respondent and appellants seem to be in accord as to the application of sections 3308 and 3354 of the Civil Code to the facts of this case. The only dispute seems to be as to the form and sufficiency of proof as to conforming with the requirements of these sections of the Civil Code. Upon the defendants' failure to comply with their agreement by the shipment of the monthly installments of box material, according to its terms, the plaintiff went out into the open market and actually purchased flammable oil cases as nearly similar in form and quality to those prescribed in the defendants' contract as possible at the best obtainable prices, and he made proof of those purchases. The plaintiff thus went further than he was required to do under the terms of the sections of the Civil Code above referred to; and the fact that he made these actual purchases in the open market at the prices paid would be some evidence of the market value of such material in the market nearest the place where the property ought to have been delivered to him. But the plaintiff's evidence did not stop here, for he also produced certain qualified witnesses as to the market price at which such material might have been bought in the San Francisco market at a time shortly after the defendants' breaches of their agreement began. An examination of this evidence sufficiently shows it to have been in compliance with the provisions of the sections of the Civil Code above referred to, and to have been amply sufficient to uphold the findings of the trial court as to the amount of the plaintiff's damages.

The cases of Cal. White Pine Agency v. Penoyer, 167 Cal. 274, 139 Pac. 671, and Fairchild, etc., Co. v. Southern Refining Co., 158 Cal. 264, 110 Pac. 951, construing the foregoing sections of the Civil Code, would seem to be precisely in point in their application to the form of proof presented by plaintiff in the instant case in support of his claim for damages. We find no merit, therefore, in the appellants' second contention.

[3] The appellants' final contention is that the trial court failed to make any findings upon the issues presented by the special defenses in the defendants' answer. The first of these was the defense that the performance of the agreement on the defendants' part had been prevented by the acts of the public enemy of the state or of the United States. The only basis for this defense put forth by the defendants was in the form of certain questions asked of one of them as to the existence of war conditions at the time, which rendered it difficult for the defendants to procure the particular wood out of which the oil cases, which they were to supply under their agreement, were to be made, arising out of the fact that the United States government was requiring, and in fact commandeering, a large amount of the same material for use in making aeroplanes. Clearly this is not the act of a public enemy which would serve to excuse the performance of defendants' agreement under section 1511 of the Civil Code; and, there not only being no other evidence offered by the defendants in support of this particular plea, but on the other hand there being affirmative and undisputed evidence that the plaintiff was able to buy, and did in fact buy, similar material in the open market at a time shortly after the breaches of the defendants' agreement by them began, the trial court was not required to make a finding upon this issue, unsupported, as it was, by any evidence sufficient to justify a finding thereon.

[4] As to the other two special defenses pleaded by the defendants upon which the trial court failed to make findings, namely, that the time for the performance of the defendants' agreement had been extended by the plaintiff, and also that its performance had been waived by him, we have failed to find from a careful perusal of the record herein that there was any tangible evidence offered in support of either of these special defenses, but that on the other hand the record amply discloses that the plaintiff, while dealing fairly and even patiently with the defendants with respect to their delay and failure in making deliveries in compliance with the terms of their agreement, was at all times insisting and urging its performance upon them. Upon this state of the evidence the trial court was not required to make express findings as to these particular pleas, since it had already expressly found that the defendants had breached their agreement, which finding would in itself be inconsistent with and would negative the defendants' contention as to any extensions of time for or waiver of the performance on their part. We find, therefore, this final contention of the appellants to be also without merit.

Judgment affirmed.

PEOPLE v. SUPERIOR COURT IN AND FOR LOS ANGELES COUNTY et al. (Civ. 3667.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. June 13, 1921.)

Criminal law ⇐302(2)—Indictment and information ⇐121(1)—Court can dismiss prosecution for any reasons in furtherance of justice.

The superior court has jurisdiction, under Pen. Code, § 1385, to dismiss a criminal action for any reason it determines to be in furtherance of justice, so that it can dismiss such action for failure of the district attorney to furnish the defendants with a bill of particulars, even though the court is not authorized to require the furnishing of such bill.

Application by the People for a writ of prohibition to be directed to the Superior Court in and for Los Angeles County, Frederick W. Houser, Judge, to prevent the dismissal of a criminal action for failure of the prosecuting attorney to file a bill of particulars. Petition denied.

Thomas Lee Woolwine, Dist. Atty., of Los Angeles, for the People.

PER CURIAM. Petitioners have applied for a writ of prohibition to prevent respondent court from dismissing a certain criminal action.

It appears from the petition that in response to a motion of the defendants in that action, the superior court, acting through the judge named in the petition herein, has ordered that the district attorney furnish each of the defendants with a bill of particulars covering certain matters described in the motion. The court granted the motion, and further stated that unless the bill of particulars is furnished the court will dismiss the action. The district attorney has declined to comply with the order.

The question whether or not, in a criminal action, the court may require the people to furnish a bill of particulars apparently has not been passed upon in this state, except that in People v. Alviso, 55 Cal. 230, the Supreme Court stated that the furnishing of such bill of particulars is not required by any section of the Penal Code, "and we do not call to mind any rule of law requiring the same to be done." For authorities generally covering this subject see Annotated Cases, 1913A, 1207.

It is not necessary to pass upon the question above stated, and we express no opinion thereon. We think that respondent has jurisdiction to dismiss the action for any reason that it determines to be in furtherance of justice. Pen. Code, § 1385; People v. More, 71 Cal. 546, 12 Pac. 631. For this reason the petition is denied.

McMILLAN v. GREENAMYER et al.
(Civ. 3234.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. May 26, 1921.)

Associations ⟸20(5)—Answer by one of three trustees held to state defense to action on note.

In an action on a note against the trustees of an association doing business under a declaration of trust, where two of the trustees confessed judgment, an answer by the third trustee alleging that there was no consideration or that the consideration had failed to a material extent through plaintiff's manipulations, and that the other trustees were susceptible to plaintiff's will and conniving with plaintiff to wreck the association in order to deprive the answering trustee of his valuable interest therein, stated a defense.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; S. M. Marsh, Judge.

Action by Joseph McMillan against C. V. Greenamyer and others, as trustees, doing business under the name and style of the Mechanical Development Company. From a judgment for plaintiff, the defendant named appeals. Reversed and remanded.

Rupert B. Turnbull, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

W. R. Millar, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WORKS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment against three defendants upon a confession of judgment filed by two of them. Before the confession was filed the third defendant had interposed an answer to the complaint, and, after it was filed and by leave of court, he presented an amended answer. The trial court, without in any manner disposing of this pleading and without the hearing of any evidence, and without any findings of fact, rendered judgment upon the confession. Respondent moved for a dismissal of this appeal on the ground that an appeal from a judgment by confession does not lie. We denied the motion (McMillan v. Greenamyer, 195 Pac. 734), and determined that the answering defendant had the right to maintain a defense in the action. A more detailed statement of the facts will be found in the opinion then delivered. Appellant presented a brief in opposition to the motion to dismiss the appeal, but has filed none for our consideration in passing upon the appeal on its merits.

On the motion to dismiss we not only determined that the answering defendant had a right to defend, but we had this to say of his amended answer:

"If the statements made therein were substantiated by proof, the court would have been justified in rendering a different judgment than that founded on the confession."

This was, in effect, a decision that the amended answer stated a defense, and the merit of the appeal was thus determined. We have, however, again examined the pleading, and there is no doubt that it puts in issue material allegations of the complaint, and that it properly pleads defensive new matter as well.

The judgment is reversed, and the cause is remanded.

McCAIN v. CITY OF OAKLAND et al.
(Civ. 3813, 3814.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 16, 1921.)

1. Appeal and error ⟸854(6)—Order granting new trial, not designating ground, affirmed, if order can be sustained on any ground assigned in motion.

Order granting new trial, made prior to amendment of Code Civ. Proc. § 657, not designating the ground on which the new trial was granted, must be affirmed, if it can be sustained on any one of the grounds assigned in the motion for new trial.

2. New trial ⟸70—Court required to grant new trial, if evidence appears insufficient.

If the evidence appeared to the trial judge to be insufficient, it was not only his privilege, but his duty, to grant a new trial.

3. Appeal and error ⟸979(2)—Order granting new trial for insufficiency of evidence not disturbed, unless court abused discretion.

Order granting a new trial for insufficiency of evidence cannot be disturbed on appeal, unless it appears that the trial judge abused its discretion.

4. Municipal corporations ⟸817(1)—Extent of burden of proof in action against city officer for injuries from defective street stated.

In an action against a city officer for injuries from defects in street, under St. 1911, p. 1115, plaintiff was required to prove that a dangerous or defective condition of the street existed, in consequence of which plaintiff suffered injury, that the officer had actual notice of such condition, that plaintiff used due care to avoid the danger, that the officer had authority to remedy the condition at the expense of the city, and that funds were available for that purpose.

5. Appeal and error ⟸874(5)—Nonsuits as to certain defendants not available on appeal from order granting new trial on motion of other defendants.

On plaintiff's appeal from order granting a new trial after verdict had been rendered for plaintiff against some of the defendants, the action of the court in granting motions of other defendants for nonsuits was not available, since the proper method of raising the error in rendering the judgment for such other defendants was by appeal from such judgment.

6. Appeal and error ⊂=173(5), 673(2)—Objection not raised in trial court not available on appeal; defense based on bond not in record not considered.

In action against the commissioner of a city and his surety for injuries from defective street, the objection by the surety that the commissioner's bond ran exclusively to the city, and did not inure to one claiming damages against the commissioner, and was not controlled by Pol. Code, § 958 et seq., was not available on appeal, where not raised in the trial court, and where record did not contain the bond, so that court was unable to see whether it contained a provision to effect that it inured to city exclusively.

7. Appeal and error ⊂=910—Where bond not in record, no presumption that it contained provision defeating right of plaintiff to sue.

In action against commissioner of a city and his surety for injuries from defective street, where record on appeal did not contain surety bond, surety's objection that bond did not inure to plaintiff, but to city exclusively, could not be considered, as appellate court would not presume that bond contained a provision that city alone could sue thereon.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; T. W. Harris, Judge.

Action by Jessie L. McCain against the City of Oakland, Frederick Soderberg, and the Fidelity & Deposit Company of Maryland. Verdict for plaintiff against the two last-named defendants and from the judgment thereon they appeal. From an order granting a new trial, plaintiff appeals. Appeal from judgment dismissed, and order granting new trial affirmed.

Ostrander, Clark & Carey, of Oakland, for plaintiff.

Guy Le Roy Stevick, Alfred C. Skaife, and Redman & Alexander, all of San Francisco, for defendant Fidelity & Deposit Company of Maryland.

H. L. Hagan, City Atty., John J. Earle, Asst. City Atty., and Chapman & Trefethen, all of Oakland, for defendant Soderberg.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff commenced this action against the city of Oakland, the members of the city council, designated as commissioners, and the Fidelity & Deposit Company of Maryland, surety upon the official bonds of the commissioners. The cause of action was based upon personal injuries received by plaintiff while riding in an automobile along one of the public streets of the city. The injury was occasioned by the collision on the night of September 19, 1917, of the automobile with a bulkhead alleged to have been constructed and maintained by the city authorities in a defective and dangerous condition. Upon demurrer the action fell as to the city of Oakland. At the conclusion of plaintiff's main case all the remaining defendants moved for nonsuits. These motions were denied at the time, except as to the defendant Morse, whose motion was granted. At the end of defendants' case the court, of its own motion, reversed this ruling and ordered nonsuits as to all these defendants, other than Soderberg and the surety company, as to whom the motions were denied. Though it does not so appear in the order, it is stated that the reason for making the distinction between Commissioner Soderberg and the other commissioners was that he was the commissioner having special jurisdiction over the construction of street improvements. The cause then went to the jury as to these two defendants, and a verdict resulted in favor of plaintiff in the sum of $5,149. Thereafter the court granted the motion of these defendants for a new trial.

The case comes before this court on two appeals, presented, by stipulation, on one single record: (1) Plaintiff's appeal from the order granting a new trial; and (2) the appeal of defendants Soderberg and the surety company from the judgment. The latter appeal is not seriously urged; counsel stating in their briefs that an affirmance of the order granting a new trial disposes of their appeal.

[1] The motion for a new trial was made upon eight separate grounds. It was granted November 8, 1918, prior to the amendment to section 657, Code of Civil Procedure. It did not designate the ground upon which it was granted. Hence, if the order can be sustained upon any one of the grounds assigned, it must be affirmed. Gordon v. Roberts, 162 Cal. 506, 508, 123 Pac. 288, and cases there cited. On this appeal defendants place their main reliance upon the insufficiency of the evidence to sustain the verdict, and plaintiff argues that it is apparent from statements made by the trial judge during the course of the hearing on the motion that this was the ground upon which the order was based.

[2, 3] If the evidence appeared to the trial judge to be insufficient, it was not only his privilege, but his duty, to grant a new trial (Green v. Soule, 145 Cal. 96, 102, 78 Pac. 337); and the order so made cannot be disturbed on appeal, unless it clearly appears that this trial judge abused the discretion committed to him (Estate of Wall [Sup.] 191 Pac. 687; Estate of Bainbridge, 169 Cal. 166, 169, 146 Pac. 427).

In the present case plaintiff's cause of action was based upon an alleged statutory liability arising out of the provisions of the act relating to the liability of public officers for damages resulting from defects and dangers in streets, highways, etc. Stats. 1911, p. 1115. The portion of the act material to this case is the provision that no public officer having charge of the repair of a highway shall be liable for injury arising from the dangerous or defective condition thereof "unless such officer shall have had actual notice of such defective or dangerous condition and shall have failed for a reasonable time after such actual notice to repair the same: Provided, that such officer had authority to remedy such condition * * * and funds were available for that purpose." It is also necessary under the act in order to hold the public officer liable that it shall appear "that such damage or injury was sustained while said street, highway * * * was being carefully used and that due care was exercised to avoid such danger."

[4] Though this statute, in so far as it relates to the liability of public officers, is negative in character, counsel assume that it is sufficient to fix a liability upon the public officers if the conditions specified therein are shown to exist. Both parties rely solely upon this statute as fixing defendant's liability, and, such being the case, it was necessary for plaintiff to prove: (1) That a dangerous or defective condition of the street existed in consequence of which plaintiff suffered the injury; (2) that defendant Soderberg had actual notice of such condition; (3) that plaintiff used due care to avoid the danger; (4) that defendant Soderberg had authority to remedy the condition at the expense of the city; and (5) that funds were available for that purpose. If any one of these conditions was not proved by sufficient evidence, the trial judge was justified in setting the verdict aside. On each one of these five essential elements of recovery the evidence was conflicting and uncertain, and on each one the trial court could have justly held that plaintiff failed to meet the burden of proof.

It was shown that the bulkhead was a solid structure of stone and cement 4 feet high completely across Rio Vista avenue, placed there by the superintendent of streets in accordance with an ordinance of the city council to close the southerly end of the street to traffic. It was a permanent structure, free from defects in construction and from any danger in the daytime. As to the nighttime it might be a source of danger to fast-driving automobilists, unless it could be disclosed by either the light from a street lamp or the headlights of the approaching vehicle. There was evidence that the bulkhead was sufficiently lighted by a street lamp and that it was easily discernible from headlights of an approaching vehicle.

There was no direct evidence that the defendant Soderberg had any notice of any danger resulting from its construction or the manner in which it was maintained. The only evidence as to actual notice on his part was that at some time not stated the superintendent of streets took him over the streets of Oakland, showing him where the witness was engaged in work, and that included in that trip was Rio Vista avenue. The work on this bulkhead was then in course of construction, and plaintiff assumes that defendant Soderberg saw it; but there was no attempt to show that it was then in any dangerous or defective condition, that warning lights were not being used at that time, or that defendant Soderberg was ever informed that the bulkhead was insufficiently lighted in the nighttime.

The evidence relating to the care used in driving the automobile, the authority of defendant Soderberg, rather than the superintendent of streets or other municipal officer, to remedy any dangerous condition, and the availability of funds for the purpose, is of like character. From a review of the record it is apparent that the trial court did not abuse its discretion in granting the motion for a new trial.

[5] Plaintiff assigns as error the action of the trial court in granting the motions of the other defendants for nonsuits. Nothing appears in the record as to these motions subsequent to the order granting them. If judgment followed in their favor, the proper way to raise the error would be by appeal from that judgment. The motions no doubt were granted because there was not a particle of evidence tending to bring those defendants within the terms of the statute of 1911.

[6, 7] The surety company raises by separate brief the question whether it can be liable in any event, as its bond ran exclusively to the city of Oakland, and does not inure to one claiming damages against a commissioner of the city. In this connection it is argued that the bond, having been given under the charter of the city of Oakland, inures to the benefit of the city exclusively and is not controlled by the general Code provisions (section 958 et seq., Pol. Code) relating to bonds payable to the state of California. But this question is not properly before the court on this appeal; it was not raised in the trial court, and the bond is not included in the record. The city charter does not require that the official bonds shall inure exclusively to the city, and, in the absence of a record, the court cannot assume that the bond in this case contained that provision.

The judgment having been set aside by the order granting a new trial, the appeal from that judgment has now become moot. That appeal is therefore dismissed. The order granting a new trial is affirmed.

PALMER v. HARLOW. (Civ. 2249.)

1. Master and servant ⟸39(1) — Complaint held insufficient to show wrongful discharge.

Where a master has wrongfully discharged a servant during the contract term, in an action ex delicto for damages for its breach, plaintiff must directly aver a wrongful discharge, and a statement that defendant has refused to permit plaintiff to proceed with the performance of services and has refused to pay plaintiff under the contract, while sufficient to entitle plaintiff to recover so much of his monthly compensation as may be then due, would not be sufficient to show that he had been discharged.

2. Master and servant ⟸39(1) — Complaint held to state cause of action for money due on contract.

In a servant's ex contractu action a complaint alleging that defendant refused to permit plaintiff to proceed with services under the contract and refused to pay for services, held to state a cause of action for money due plaintiff as salary and for rentals which plaintiff was required to pay because of defendant's failure to live up to contract terms to furnish defendant with a place to live, and not subject to a general demurrer.

3. Master and servant ⟸39(1)—General rules of pleading breach of contract obtain.

The general rules of pleading in actions for breach of contracts obtain in actions for breach of employment contracts, and the complaint, containing the essential elements of a good cause of action ex contractu showing the making of the agreement between the parties and alleging the amount of damages to plaintiff from the breach, is sufficient.

4. Master and servant ⟸39(1) — Other employment in mitigation of damages for breach of contract matter of defense.

A servant discharged or prevented by the master's breach of the agreement from performing services is in duty bound to seek other employment and his damages should be diminished to the extent of the compensation received during the term of the contract, but this is a matter of defense which may be pleaded by the defendant in mitigation of damages, and plaintiff need not plead it.

5. Master and servant ⟸39(1) — Complaint for breach of contract sufficient without averment as to location of house secured.

In a servant's action for breach of contract, where the complaint states that plaintiff was required to secure a house other than that with which defendant agreed to furnish him for living purposes during the contract, it is immaterial so far as the pleading is concerned, where the house so rented by plaintiff was situated.

Appeal from Superior Court, Siskiyou County; James F. Lodge, Judge.

Action by L. A. Palmer against A. L. Harlow. Demurrer to complaint sustained, and default judgment against plaintiff, and he appeals. Reversed, with directions to allow defendant to answer the complaint adjudged sufficient.

Charles L. Gilmore, of Sacramento, for appellant.

Collier & McNamara, of Yreka, for respondent.

HART, J. The plaintiff brought this action to recover the aggregate sum of $1,846 alleged to be due him from defendant according to the terms of a certain contract into which, it is alleged, he and the defendant entered on the 25th day of July, 1918.

The court below sustained a demurrer interposed by defendant to the complaint upon both general and special grounds. The plaintiff refused to amend his complaint, although allowed by the court 10 days within which to do so, if so advised, and thereupon judgment by default was entered against plaintiff.

The appeal is from said judgment.

The complaint alleges:

"That heretofore, to wit, on the 16th day of July, 1918, defendant submitted to plaintiff a proposition of contract in words and figures as follows, to wit: 'Proposition to L. A. Palmer. Finish house inspected July 15, 1918, and give house rent and water. Furnish office and instruments and tools. Salary $100 a month. Duties, to attend to all of engineering work now constructed and attend to prospective litigation, etc. Free to attend to consulting work at any time. On any new projects that may be worked up together Harlow to finance and Palmer to receive 25 per cent. of net profits for doing engineering. Agreement to run one year after beginning active work. Renewable at option of both. A. L. Harlow, 7/16/18'—that thereafter, to wit, on the 25th day of July, 1918, plaintiff accepted the above and foregoing proposition of contract and agreed to its terms by so informing defendant, in person, and plaintiff did then and there offer and ask to enter upon the services of defendant, and plaintiff was then and there, and ever since has been, and now is ready and willing to perform all of the terms and conditions of said contract on his part to be kept and performed; that defendant has failed and neglected to perform the terms and conditions or any of them of said contract upon his part to be kept and performed, and has failed, neglected, and refused to pay or cause to be paid to plaintiff the salary set forth in said contract at the rate of $100 per month, or house rent, or water rentals ever since the 13th day of September, 1918, on which said date defendant paid plaintiff the sum of $100 * * * as payment of plaintiff's salary for the month ending August 25, 1918, and defendant still fails and refuses to pay said salary or house rent or water rentals, although repeatedly requested by plaintiff so to do; that by reason of the failure, neglect, and refusal of defendant to perform the terms and conditions of said contract upon his part to be kept and performed, and because of his refusal so to keep and perform his said terms of contract, plaintiff has been forced to rent other and different premises in which to live than those so promised by defendant, and has been forced to pay water rentals for domestic uses in said rented premises to a total cost of $446; * * * that no part of said salary due and payable by defendant from and after the 25th day of August, 1918, to and including the 25th day of October, 1919, and no part of the aforesaid house rent or rentals for water for domestic use in such rented premises from and after the 25th day of July, 1918, to and including the 25th day of October, 1919, has been paid to plaintiff; that no part of said salary, house rent, or water rentals has been paid to plaintiff during any of said months, and there still remains due and unpaid under said contract to plaintiff the sum of $1,846."

The special grounds of demurrer are:

"That said complaint is uncertain in that it does not appear therein, nor can it be ascertained therefrom, whether or not plaintiff was engaged in any employment during the period from the 25th day of July, 1918, to and including the 25th day of October, 1919; nor does it appear therein, nor can it be ascertained therefrom, whether or not plaintiff made any effort to obtain employment; that paragraph 4 of said complaint is uncertain in that it does not appear therein, nor can it be ascertained therefrom, where or in what place plaintiff was forced to rent other and different premises in which to live, as alleged in said paragraph; that said complaint is ambiguous and unintelligible for the same reasons that it is herein alleged to be uncertain."

The pleaded contract, as one for the employment of the personal services of a person, or as to the nature of such services, is not as explicit as it could have been made; nor does the complaint otherwise furnish any explanation of the exact nature of the services to be performed. It is, however, made clear enough to appear by the complaint that the defendant employed the plaintiff to perform for him certain personal services as an engineer for the period of one year, beginning from the date of the acceptance by plaintiff of said contract of employment (July 25, 1918), and, that in return for the services so performed, the defendant was to pay the plaintiff the sum of $100 per month, with house rent and rates for water to be used for domestic purposes free or as a part of the compensation so to be paid plaintiff.

[1] In cases of the character of the one here, where the master has wrongfully discharged the servant before the expiration of the period of time during which the contract by its terms, is to run, the complaint, in an action ex delicto for damages for its breach, must show by a direct averment of some character that there was a wrongful discharge of plaintiff by defendant. In such an action the statement in the complaint that the defendant has refused to permit the plaintiff to proceed with the performance of the services called for by the contract and has refused to pay plaintiff for such services, while undoubtedly sufficient to entitle the plaintiff to recover so much of his monthly compensation as may then be due under the contract, would not be sufficient to show that he had been discharged. Stone v. Bancroft, 112 Cal. 652, 44 Pac. 1069; Stone v. Bancroft, 139 Cal. 78, 83, 70 Pac. 1017, 72 Pac. 717; Winsor v. Silica Brick Co., 31 Cal. App. 85, 89, 159 Pac. 877; Percival v. National Drama Corporation, 181 Cal. 631, 638, 185 Pac. 972.

[2] In the present case, however, the action is upon the contract and was commenced after the expiration of the year during which it was to run; and, while it may be conceded that the complaint would not be accepted as a model pleading, it nevertheless, as against a general demurrer, sufficiently states a cause of action for money due the plaintiff as his salary or compensation for his services under the contract and for the rentals which plaintiff was required to pay for the use of a house and of water by reason of the failure of the defendant to live up to the terms of the contract. It alleges, it will be noted, that the plaintiff accepted the proposition by defendant, that he offered and asked to be permitted to enter upon the performance of the services required by the contract, and that he was at all times "ready and willing to perform all of the terms and conditions of said contract on his part to be kept and performed," but that defendant failed and refused "to perform the terms and conditions or any of them of said contract on his part to be kept and performed," and has refused to pay plaintiff the compensation which by the contract he agreed to pay him, except the salary falling due for the services performed for the first month of the term of the contract. A demurrer upon proper special grounds pointing out the particulars in which the statement of the facts was insufficient might have brought about an amendment of the complaint whereby the facts pleaded would have been stated in clearer language; but this is not to say that the facts, inartificially stated though they are, are not sufficient to disclose a cause of action for money due plaintiff under the contract. To the contrary, as above declared, we think they do constitute a cause of action.

[3] It is well settled that the general rules of pleading in actions for the breach of contracts obtain in actions for the breach of contracts of employment. Thus, in an action upon a contract, the complaint or declaration contains the essential elements of a good cause of action ex contractu if it shows the making of a contract between the plaintiff and the defendant, and alleges the amount of damages resulting to the plaintiff from the breach. 9 Cyc. p. 711. And, as stated, this rule can be no less applicable in actions on contracts of employment than in actions on any other character of contracts.

As to the special grounds of demurrer set up against the sufficiency of the statement of the facts pleaded in the complaint, it will require but little reflection to convince even the hypercritical that the objections so made are, so far as the matter of pleading is concerned, devoid of substantial, or indeed any real merit.

[4] It is obviously true that the earning and receipt of compensation by a servant for services performed for other persons than the defendant after his (the servant's) discharge or after he has been prevented by defendant from performing the services constitutes an element in the measure of damages in such a case. Seymour v. Oelrichs, 156 Cal. 782, 800, 106 Pac. 88, 134 Am. St. Rep. 154. It is also true that it is the duty of a servant wrongfully discharged by his master to seek other employment, and, if obtaining it, thereby diminish the damages suffered by him from the act of the employer in wrongfully dismissing him from his service. But, as above stated, the action here is upon the contract, and it was sufficient to allege that the defendant had failed or refused to comply with the terms of the contract, and this is shown here by the averment that plaintiff was wrongfully prevented by defendant from performing the services required of him by the contract. "Generally it may be said that the declaration, petition, or complaint in an action for wrongful discharge is sufficient if it contains all that it is necessary for plaintiff to prove under a plea of the general issue." If, therefore, the plaintiff, in other employments, during the term of the contract, and after he was prevented by defendant from performing the services under the contract in question, performed services for some other person or persons than the defendant, for which he received compensation, or if he refused or negligently failed to seek other employment after his discharge, those facts or either of them constituted a matter of defense, which could be set up by the defendant as in abatement of damages or of any sum which it might be shown that the plaintiff would otherwise be entitled to. In Rosenberger v. Pacific Coast Ry. Co., 111 Cal. 313, 318, 43 Pac. 963, 964, the Supreme Court has this to say upon the proposition now in hand:

"The court properly refused the instruction asked by the defendant. While it is the duty of an employee who has been wrongfully discharged to seek other employment, and thus diminish the damages sustained by him, he is not required, as a condition of recovery, to show that he has made such endeavor and failed. The burden is on the defendant to show that he could by diligence have obtained employment elsewhere. Whatever compensation may have been received in such employment is also to be shown by the defendant in mitigation of damages; otherwise the damages will be measured by the salary or wages agreed to be paid. Sutherland on Damages, § 693; Costigan v. Mohawk, etc., R. R. Co., 2 Denio, 609, 43 Am. Dec. 758; Howard v. Daly, 61 N. Y. 362, 19 Am. Rep. 285; Utter v. Chapman, 43 Cal. 279."

See, also, Nuckolls v. College of Physicians & Surgeons, etc., 7 Cal. App. 233, 94 Pac. 81.

[5] The third and fourth special grounds of demurrer are obviously without force. The complaint states that plaintiff was required to secure a house other than the one with which defendant agreed to furnish him in which to live during the term of the contract, and it is, so far as the matter of pleading is concerned wholly immaterial where the house so rented by him was situated. Indeed, such an averment would involve, if anything, the statement of an evidentiary fact.

We conclude that the demurrer should have been overruled.

The judgment is reversed, with direction to the trial court to allow defendant to answer the complaint, should he be so advised.

MARTIN v. PRITCHARD. (Civ. 2313; Sac. 3134.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 23, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 22, 1921.)

1. Husband and wife ⇐264—Finding of community estate sustained.

In an action involving interest of wife in land, evidence held to support a finding that the land in question was community property, although husband and wife designated their relation as a matrimonial partnership.

2. Husband and wife ⇐266—Contracts as to property valid.

A husband and wife may by contract change the character of their property from community to separate estate, and may by contract transmute the separate property of either into community property.

3. Husband and wife ⇐29(5)—May contract concerning property in anticipation of marriage.

Separate property may be by contract transmuted into community property by contract made prior to and in anticipation of marriage.

4. Frauds, statute of ⊂⊃4, 139(2)—Contract transmuting separate into community property required to be in writing.

A contract made prior to and in anticipation of marriage transmuting separate property of the parties into community property should be in writing, but, where it has been fully executed by one party, the case is taken out of the statute, and it is not assailable by the parties thereto or by third parties on the ground that it was not in writing.

5. Vendor and purchaser ⊂⊃35—Agreement to sell implied representation of title.

An agreement to sell land was an implied representation that vendor was able to give a good title.

On Hearing in Supreme Court.

6. Exchange of property ⊂⊃8(3)—Bad faith must be pleaded in action for damages for failure to exchange lands.

In an action for damages for refusal to exchange land, bad faith, if relied upon, must be pleaded.

7. Exchange of property ⊂⊃8(3)—Bad faith held not sufficient allegation in action for damages for refusal to exchange.

In an action for damages for failure to exchange lands, an allegation that defendant refused to perform his contract "without any just reason or excuse" was not a sufficient allegation of bad faith on the part of the defendant in not notifying plaintiff that his wife had some interest in the land.

8. Costs ⊂⊃22—Judgment for nominal damages does not carry.

A judgment for nominal damages does not carry costs, under Code Civ. Proc. § 1022, subd. 3.

9. Appeal and error ⊂⊃1171(6) — Judgment not reversed so as to permit recovery of nominal damages.

A judgment for defendant in an action ex contractu for damages, where it is established that plaintiff is entitled to nothing more than nominal damages, will not be reversed on appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; J. A. Allen, Judge.

Action by Charles Martin against J. D. Pritchard. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed in the District Court of Appeal, and hearing denied in Supreme Court.

Hugo K. Asher, of San Francisco, and Bradley & Bradley, of Visalia, for appellant.

E. I. Feemster and Middlecoff & Feemster, all of Visalia, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. Plaintiff sued to recover damages alleged to have been caused by the defendant's breach of contract to exchange 20 acres of land in Tulare county, together with farming implements and three horses, for plaintiff's cottage and two flats in Berkeley. Judgment was rendered in favor of the defendant, and the plaintiff appeals therefrom.

The complaint alleges the execution of the contract on August 15, 1917, performance by the plaintiff, and tender of deeds to the Berkeley properties, and that the defendant, "without any just reason or excuse," refused to make the exchange. The complaint further averred that the clear value of the Berkeley property was $4,500, and that of the Tulare property $9,500, and prayed for damages in the sum of $5,000, the difference in value. No other damages were claimed. The defendant admits the making of the contract and its breach, but denies that he refused to make the exchange "without just reason or excuse." He admits that the value of the Tulare property was $4,000 more than that of the Berkeley property. The court found the difference in value between the two properties to be $4,000; that the defendant refused to make the exchange, but that his refusal was not "without just reason or excuse"; that when he signed the contract and long prior thereto he was married to Lena L. Pritchard; that the Tulare property was the community property of the defendant and his wife; that the contract was made without the knowledge or consent of the wife, and that she did not know of the defendant's intention to enter into the contract, or that he was contemplating an "exchange of said property for any other properties"; that when informed of such contract she refused to be bound by it; that she has at all times refused to join in the conveyance of the property to the plaintiff, and that immediately after being informed of the contract she notified the plaintiff that she would not join in a conveyance of the property, and threatened legal proceedings to prevent the exchange; that the defendant was willing and ready to make the exchange, and would have done so but for the objections and threatened legal proceedings of his wife; and that the defendant was not guilty of bad faith in refusing to comply with his contract.

The evidence is not clear as to when and how the defendant acquired the Tulare property, but it appears that he purchased it under contract not later than the year 1907; that at the time of the purchase he paid thereon $12.50 an acre, and was to pay the remainder in installments of $10 a month, the total purchase price not being shown; that at some time thereafter the property was conveyed to him, and in turn deeded to his mother, on conditions not disclosed, and that, after he had fulfilled those conditions the property was conveyed to him about a month prior to his marriage to his present wife; that in the year 1907 the defendant built a four-room house on the land at a cost of $400 or $500, and made other improvements; that in the year 1908 the defendant planted 5 acres to oranges, and 12 acres two years later.

The defendant and his wife were married in October, 1911. In the latter part of 1910, in contemplation of the marriage, the defendant, his present wife and her parents came to an agreement that the parents would advance certain moneys to the defendant and his wife for the operation and improvement of the place, with the understanding that the wife was to have an interest therein. The defendant testified that—

"It was a matrimonial partnership; that is, it was a joint proposition, that whatever we were interested in, we would be interested in together, we would take all things into account."

Mrs. Pritchard testified:

"I had recently overstudied at college very badly, and the folks preferred we should live on the orange grove on account of my health, and my husband was not sure that he could support the orange grove and a wife, and my father agreed that he would help. * * * My husband objected to taking anything from his future father-in-law and mother-in-law, and my papa said, 'Well, they would get around that question or difficulty by putting it into the place and conveniences on the place,' and wanted to know if my husband would consider we were partners. The idea is that my husband already had a son, the reason that there was such a definite business agreement, how he would regard that the property stood. My husband said that was the only property that he had, and he would be glad to make that arrangement."

Pursuant to this arrangement and within two months thereafter, the father advanced the sum of $350. Later he advanced $450 to enlarge and improve the residence on the place, and about the time of the marriage he gave Mrs. Pritchard $250, which was spent on the place. After the marriage the father expended $250 or $300 in the construction of a garage and implement shed. Other sums were advanced for the purchase of livestock, implements, orange trees, and other expenses in the operation of the place. All told, the father furnished between $3,000 and $3,500 for the care, development and improvement of the property.

1. Appellant contends that there is no evidence to support the court's finding that the property involved was the community property of the defendant and his wife, Lena L. Pritchard. The understanding between the parties as to the ownership of the property in question was not reduced to a formal agreement. It devolved upon the trial court to find, from the evidence bearing upon the question, the character of the wife's interest. In determining the question, the court probably gave consideration to the lack of familiarity of the witnesses with legal terms. Mrs. Pritchard testified that she did not know anything about the legal relationship of partners. The defendant testified that—

The evident purpose was to provide against the diversion from the wife's enjoyment of her parent's contribution to the property. This purpose was emphasized by the knowledge that the defendant had a son by a former marriage. The testimony of the defendant and his wife showed that the latter had an interest in the property. The evidence is not such as to require the court to find that her interest was joint, or in common, or a partnership interest rather than that of community property.

[1] That the wife had an interest in the property is very clear. What the character of that interest was is not so certain. The court came to the conclusion, on a balancing of probabilities, that a community interest was intended by the parties. It cannot be said that the court's finding has no support in the evidence.

[2-4] That a husband and wife may by contract change the character of their property from community to separate is well settled. Perkins v. Sunset Tel. & Tel. Co., 155 Cal. 712, 103 Pac. 190; Fay v. Fay, 165 Cal. 469, 132 Pac. 1040. Likewise they may by contract transmute the separate property of either into community property. Yoakam v. Kingery, 126 Cal. 30, 58 Pac. 324; Carlson v. Carlson, 10 Cal. App. 300, 101 Pac. 923. No sound reason suggests itself why they may not accomplish the same purposes by contract made prior to and in anticipation of marriage. The law requires such contracts to be in writing. Where the contract has been fully executed by one party the case is taken out of the statute.

"As the antenuptial contract is alleged to have been completely executed, the same is not assailable by the parties thereto, or by third parties, on the ground that it was not in writing, as prescribed by statute." Hussey v. Castle, 41 Cal. 242. "A parol agreement to give an intended daughter-in-law a lot of land as a home for the family, if, with her means, a suitable dwelling house was erected on it, which has been done, will be enforced in equity by a decree of specific performance." Neale v. Neale, 76 U. S. [9 Wall.] 1, 19 L. Ed. 590.

In Magee v. Magee, 174 Cal. 276, 162 Pac. 1023, the owner of a lot of land orally agreed to convey it to his brother, in consideration of the latter's erecting on the land and furnishing a house for the use of their parents during their lives. The vendee performed his part of the contract. It was held that such performance took the case out of the statute of frauds.

2. If it be conceded that the land here involved is not community property, but that the wife's interest therein is equitable only, still the husband could not in good conscience convey the same without her consent. It cannot be said that it was the legal duty of the husband to perpetrate a fraud upon his wife in order to carry out a contract which he has improvidently made with a stranger. Further, if the antenuptial agreement be held ineffective for any purpose, then part of the personal property included in the contract to exchange was the wife's separate property, because purchased with funds given to her by her father, and the husband could not dispose of it, and, consequently, he was without the authority to perform his part of the contract in full. It does not appear what the value of such personal property was, or whether the plaintiff would have accepted a conveyance of the other property described in the contract as performance of the terms thereof by the defendant.

[5] 3. The appellant urges that the defendant was guilty of bad faith, and that the measure of damages is the difference in value of the respective properties. Section 3306, Civil Code, provides:

"The detriment caused by the breach of an agreement to convey an estate in real property is deemed to be the price paid, and the expenses properly incurred in examining the title and preparing the necessary papers, with interest thereon; but adding thereto, in case of bad faith, the difference between the price agreed to be paid and the value of the estate agreed to be conveyed, at the time of the breach, and the expenses properly incurred in preparing to enter upon the land."

Bad faith must be pleaded. Yates v. James, 89 Cal. 474, 26 Pac. 1073; Willard v. Smith, 34 Mont. 494, 87 Pac. 613. One may be guilty of bad faith in entering into a contract which he knows he cannot perform or by refusing to carry out the terms of his contract which he can perform. The only allegation of the complaint herein under which bad faith could be proven, is that the defendant refused to perform his contract "without any just reason or excuse." This cannot be taken as an allegation of bad faith on the defendant's part in entering into the contract. The defendant did not inform the plaintiff and the plaintiff did not know at the time the contract was executed that the defendant was married, or that his wife had or claimed any interest in the property, though it is not claimed that the defendant willfully deceived the plaintiff. The plaintiff argues that it was bad faith on the part of the defendant not to disclose his inability to convey the property. His agreement to sell was an implied representation that he was able to give a good title. Bad faith, however, in making the contract, not having been pleaded, cannot help the cause of the plaintiff. If the allegation of refusal to convey "without any just reason or excuse" is a sufficient averment of bad faith, the answer is that there was sufficient reason for the refusal, the bad faith, if any, being in connection with the execution of the agreement, and not in the failure to carry out the provisions thereof.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: HART, J.; BURNETT, J.

Opinion of Supreme Court in bank, denying hearing:

PER CURIAM. [6-9] We concur in what is said by the District Court of Appeal on the question of measure of damages and bad faith. There was no sufficient allegation of bad faith, and therefore no basis for an award as damage of "the difference between the price agreed to be paid and the value of the estate agreed to be conveyed." No damage other than this was alleged. The trial court's finding of no actual damage is fully sustained. Assuming that there was a breach by the defendant of his agreement to convey, plaintiff would be entitled to nominal damages only, and a judgment therefor would not carry costs. Code Civ. Proc. § 1022, subd. 3. And a judgment for a defendant in an action ex contractu for damages, where it is established that a plaintiff is entitled to nothing more than nominal damages, will not be reversed on appeal. See McAllister v. Clement, 75 Cal. 182, 16 Pac. 775; Lick v. Owen, 47 Cal. 252.

In denying the application for a hearing herein we are not to be understood as intimating an opinion as to any other matters discussed in the opinion of the District Court of Appeal.

The application for a hearing in this court after decision by the District Court of Appeal of the Third Appellate District is denied.

HIRONYMOUS v. HIATT et al. (Civ. 2277.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 23, 1921.)

1. Cancellation of instruments ⟸4 — Enough that instrument is void or voidable for any reason.

To authorize action under Civ. Code, § 3412, declaring that an instrument, in respect of which there is reasonable apprehension that if left outstanding it may cause injury to a person against whom it is void or voidable, may, on his application, be so adjudged, and ordered delivered up or canceled, it is not necessary that there shall have been fraud, accident, or mistake; but it is enough that the instrument was voidable for any reason, as that it was without consideration, a mere promise of the maker to make a gift.

2. Gifts ⟸49(6)—Lack of consideration sufficiently shown.

Evidence in action under Civ. Code, § 3412, to have plaintiff's note adjudged void held to support finding that the note was without consideration, and merely involved a gift.

3. Appeal and error ⟸994(3)—Trial court's determination on credibility conclusive.

Acceptance by the trial court of the testimony of one witness, opposed to that of another witness, notwithstanding a few circumstances appearing to be sufficient to generate a suspicion of fabrication, is conclusive on the appellate court.

4. Gifts ⟸32(1)—Donor's note mere promise to give.

Delivery of the thing sought to be given, being essential under Civ. Code, §§ 1146, 1147, delivery of the donor's promissory note does not constitute an enforceable obligation, being a mere promise to make a gift of money.

5. Cancellation of instruments ⟸34(1)—Limitation of actions ⟸60(5)—Bar of statute or laches not available against action to have note adjudged void as a gift.

The statute of limitations or laches cannot be invoked against one who seeks, under Civ. Code, § 3412, to have his note adjudged void, on the ground merely that it was a mere promise to make a gift.

6. Gifts ⟸41—Facts held not to estop one seeking to have note adjudged void as a gift.

For one to permit his note to remain outstanding for years, or the renewal thereof, or the paying of interest thereon, does not constitute a recognition of its legal integrity that will estop him to maintain an action to have it adjudged void as without consideration and a mere promise to make a gift.

Appeal from Superior Court, Modoc County; Clarence A. Raker, Judge.

Action by Alice Hironymous against E. L. Hiatt, guardian, and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

Grant & Bailey, of Woodland, for appellants.

Jamison & Wylie, of Alturas, for respondent.

HART, J. This action was brought to obtain a decree adjudging void a certain promissory note executed by the plaintiff and still outstanding, as authorized in such a case by section 3412 of the Civil Code, which reads as follows:

"A written instrument, in respect to which there is a reasonable apprehension that if left outstanding it may cause serious injury to a person against whom it is void or voidable, may, upon his application, be so adjudged, and ordered to be delivered up or canceled."

The ward of the defendant guardian is the daughter of a son of the deceased husband of the plaintiff by a former wife. In the month of December, 1904, the plaintiff made and executed her promissory note, in favor of certain trustees, in trust for the said minor, for the sum of $1,000, payable on or before five years after date, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum from date until paid and payable annually. Attached to said note was a writing disclosing the following conditions to which said trust was subject:

"The trustees above named shall collect the interest upon the above note as the same becomes due, and expend the same as far as it will go in the suitable maintenance and education of the aforesaid minor child. They shall receive the aforesaid principal sum when the same shall fall due, and invest said sum in a safe manner, and apply the interest received therefrom for the benefit of said minor child as above stated, until said minor arrives at legal age, at which date the whole amount remaining in their hands shall be paid to said Jessie Bernice Hironymous. In case of the death of said minor before arriving at legal age, the amount remaining in the hands of said trustees shall, at the date when she would have become of legal age, be paid to the said Hattie Hironymous, to be by her paid in equal shares to any brothers or sisters of said minor (should any survive her) upon their arriving at the age of majority.

"We accept the foregoing trust and hereby agree that we will comply as far as in our power with the conditions therein named. Dated Cedarville, Cal., December 17, 1904."

The foregoing was subscribed to by the trustees, named as defendants herein, but was not signed by the trustor.

On the 28th day of October, 1913, no part of the principal of said note then having been paid, the plaintiff took up said note and executed and delivered to the said trustees, in lieu thereof and in trust and for the benefit of said minor, a note for the principal sum of the former note, payable on or before six years after the date thereof, with interest at 6 per cent. per annum until said note was paid, the interest payable annually. The conditions of the trust, which was accepted by said trustees, were precisely the same as those above set forth.

The complaint alleges that plaintiff signed said note as a voluntary act, never having received from said defendants or any of them any consideration of any kind or character for the "signing and executing of said note," and that "by reason thereof the same is void." It is alleged that plaintiff has paid to said defendants on said note as interest the sum approximately of $840, and that the interest so paid "is still in the possession of said defendants, and has never been delivered to said Jessie Bernice Hironymous, said minor, or to her said guardian, E. L. Hiatt."

Besides asking for a decree adjudging said note void and that the trustees be required to produce the instrument in court for cancellation, the prayer is also for a judgment for the return by the said trustees of the full amount of interest paid on said note by plaintiff.

A demurrer, upon both general and special grounds, was interposed to the complaint by the defendant Hiatt and overruled. Thereupon the defendant Hiatt, as guardian, and the defendant Penland, as trustee, filed separate answers, denying the vital averments of the complaint, and also alleging that the note in suit was made and delivered to the trustees for a valuable consideration, and further setting up in bar of the action the statute of limitations (Code Civ. Proc. §§ 337, 338, 339, and 344), and laches and estoppel. The last-named defense is stated as follows in each of said answers:

"That by reason of the long delay and the recognizance of said note as a valid obligation, and by reason of renewing the original note of December 17, 1904, and paying the sum of $840 interest on said note and the renewal note in question in this case, plaintiff is now estopped from asserting that said note is invalid."

The court found that the note in suit was by plaintiff executed and delivered to the said trustees, as alleged in the complaint; that the plaintiff had paid to said trustees interest on said note in the sum of $840; that plaintiff received no consideration of any kind or character for said note and its execution and delivery was a voluntary act on her part. No findings were made on the special pleas in bar set up by the answering defendants.

It was concluded from the findings, as a matter of law, that "the said note and the whole thereof is void and of no effect" because of having been given without a consideration, "and that plaintiff is entitled to have said note surrendered up and canceled." The judgment accords with the findings and conclusions of law, and requires the said trustees to deliver said note to the clerk for cancellation, etc. The sum paid to the trustees by plaintiff as interest on said note is awarded to the guardian of the minor for her benefit.

The case is brought here by the defendants on an appeal from the judgment, under the alternative method.

[1] The first assignment of error presented and discussed by appellants involves the claim that the complaint states no cause of action for the reason that, although the action may be based upon section 3412 of the Civil Code, the ultimate relief sought is the cancellation of a written instrument on the ground of want of consideration, in which case, so the argument goes, there must be shown, by both pleading and proof, either fraud or accident or mistake.

It is undoubtedly true that the remedy afforded by section 3412 is of an equitable nature, but we are not altogether in accord with the position of appellants as to the nature of the facts which must exist and be shown to justify resort to and the employment of the remedy so afforded. The section clearly contemplates that any written instrument which for any reason is void or voidable and outstanding, and which by reason thereof may result in serious injury or prejudice to the party as to whom it is void or voidable, may be, upon proper application, adjudged to be void, and ordered to be delivered up and canceled, and all that is required either in pleading or proof is to show the facts constituting the invalidity of the instrument, whether they involve fraud, duress, accident, mistake, or, as in this case, a promise to make a gift and consequently without consideration. If, in other words, the instrument has been procured by fraud or accident, etc., then the fraud or accident or mistake should be pleaded; if the instrument is for any other reason void or voidable, then the facts showing it to be such, whatever be their nature, should be shown, and in such case, if the facts be well pleaded, a case is stated.

The special grounds of demurrer, viz., that the complaint is uncertain in that it cannot be told therefrom how the sum of $840 could have accrued as interest on said note, and that the plaintiff is without capacity to sue, are obviously devoid of merit, and their further consideration herein is not required.

[2, 3] It is next contended that the findings are not sufficiently supported and that the failure of the court to find on the special defenses is fatal to the judgment. The plaintiff, on both her direct and cross examination, repeatedly declared that neither for the original note nor for the note in suit, given as a renewal of the former, did she receive any consideration whatever from the trustees or from any other person. She declared that the note was a gift to the minor. She testified that she was led to make the gift to the minor because—

"I loved the little child and because she was my husband's granddaughter, and I felt sorry for her; the father and mother were not doing anything to take care of this property, and I thought some time in the future she might need some help, and this amount of money when she became of age might help to educate her. It was a voluntary gift on my part."

It appears that the husband of the deceased devised to his son, Frank Hironymous, father of the minor made the beneficiary of the note in suit, a small parcel of land in Modoc county. It further appears that Frank defaulted in the payment of the taxes assessed against said land for several years, and that the property was finally sold to the state and in due legal time purchased from the state by the plaintiff; that thereafter the plaintiff brought an action in the superior court of Modoc county against said Frank Hironymous to quiet her title to said land; that, while said action was pending and before it was brought to trial, said Frank signed and filed in the action a stipulation in writing to the effect that the plaintiff was entitled to judgment in said action quieting her title to said land as against him and all others who might claim any part thereof or interest therein under or through him, and that he would not defend against said suit but would allow plaintiff herein as plaintiff therein to take judgment according to the prayer of her complaint in said action; that upon the filing of said writing or stipulation in said action the plaintiff was awarded judgment therein in harmony with the prayer of her complaint therein. There was no consideration stated in the stipulation for its execution. Said stipulation, together with the judgment roll in said action, was received in evidence in the present action, and counsel for the defendants, on cross-examination, sought to induce plaintiff to say or admit that, in consideration of the execution by Frank Hironymous of the said stipulation, she promised to pay or give her note for the sum of $1,000 to the trustees for the use and benefit of Frank's infant daughter, Jessie Bernice. But the plaintiff, replying to counsel's questions, repeatedly asseverated that the making of the said stipulation by Frank Hironymous had no connection whatever with the making of the note; that when the stipulation was first suggested and finally agreed to and made by said Hironymous nothing whatever was said to her by any person, nor did she say anything about making the note or a promise to give or pay the minor or any other person for her any money or the note in suit.

Smalls and Stanley, two of the trustees, testifying for plaintiff, each stated that he was present in the law office of the attorney conducting the transaction for plaintiff when the stipulation was signed and that he heard nothing said about any consideration therefor.

The deposition of Frank Hironymous, a resident of Sacramento county at the time the deposition was taken on the 14th day of June, 1919 (the trial of the action was begun on the 28th of July, 1919), was received as evidence, and therein the deponent declared that the stipulation referred to was made and executed by him in consideration of a promise by the plaintiff to pay his daughter, the minor herein mentioned, the sum of $1,000, or to give her promissory note therefor. He further testified that the land in dispute between him and plaintiff, and as to the title to which the stipulation mentioned was made by him, was, at the time it was purchased by plaintiff, of the value of about $1,500, but that it had since enhanced considerably in value.

The foregoing embraces a synoptical statement of the evidence received at the trial, and therefrom it is perfectly plain that the finding that the note was made and given without a consideration and therefore involved a gift derives sufficient evidential support to render it impregnable against successful attack. There are, it may be conceded, a few circumstances which, upon their face, appear to be sufficient to generate a suspicion that the claim that no consideration was given for the note is a fabrication. Still it cannot justly be said that those circumstances render the plaintiff's testimony as to the principal issue inherently improbable. It was for the trial court and not this court to consider the circumstances we have in mind and determine whether they were of such force or consequence as to destroy the verity of her story in the main. The acceptance of her testimony by the trial court is therefore conclusive upon us. Moreover, the acceptance of plaintiff's testimony as verity necessarily carries with it a repudiation of Frank Hironymous' testimony between which and the former's a direct and pronounced conflict arose and exists, and that it was within the discretion or the right of the trial court to reject his testimony and accept that of the plaintiff as involving the truth as to the question of consideration is an incontrovertible proposition. Of course from this it is not to be understood that a trial court to whose determination the questions of fact are submitted may arbitrarily reject any witness' testimony, for it may do so only when legally justified after due consideration and comparison of all the evidence, and whether such justification exists is also a matter entirely with that court or the jury if the issues of fact be tried by the latter.

[4] A gift is a transfer of personal property, made voluntarily and without consideration (Civ. Code, § 1146), and a verbal gift, to be valid, must be executed, unless the means of obtaining possession and control of the subject of the gift are given, or, if it is capable of delivery, there be an actual or symbolical delivery to the donee of the thing sought to be given (Civ. Code, § 1147).

Upon the principles thus enunciated by our Legislature, it is thoroughly settled in this state that a gift by a party of his own promissory note, either inter vivos or causa mortis, does not create an enforceable obligation in favor of the donee against the donor or his estate.

In Tracy v. Alvord, 118 Cal. 654, 50 Pac. 757, the defendants' testator, about a year previously to his death, "made and signed a paper writing having the form of a promissory note for $10,000, payable 60 days from its date to the order of Felix Tracy, the plaintiff." The latter brought an action founded on said note as a demand against the estate of the deceased, claiming that the writing was delivered by the testator to a third person for plaintiff's use, and that a valid gift thereof, either inter vivos or in view of death, was made by the testator to the plaintiff. There was there, as here, no consideration for the note; the plaintiff having first learned of its existence by information from the executors some months after the testator's death. Rejecting the argument advanced by appellant, the court in that case said:

"The court below found that there was no delivery of the note as alleged by plaintiff, and held therefore that the instrument never had effect; whether the evidence justified such finding is made a question in the case, but it is not necessary to be decided. For if it were conceded that delivery was proved, yet, as between the donee and the donor or his estate, the gift of the donor's own promissory note created no enforceable obligation; being a mere promise without consideration to give a sum of money in the future, it was of no legal consequence. The gift of such a note causa mortis is within the rule; besides tending to subvert the statute of wills, it is still but a promise to make a gift, and invalid because the thing promised is not delivered. Authorities are numerous; the following are among the more recent: Bartlett's Petition, 163 Mass. 509; Sanborn v. Sanborn, 65 N. H. 172; Matter of James, 146 N. Y. 78, 58 Am. St. Rep. 774; Shaw v. Camp, 160 Ill. 425; Johnson v. Otterbein University, 41 Ohio St. 527; 1 Daniel on Negotiable Instruments, § 25."

The case of Wisler v. Tomb, 169 Cal. 383, 146 Pac. 876, is, in the facts, quite similar to the case at bar, a promissory note having been made and delivered by the defendant's testator to the plaintiff in trust for the use of a minor, without any consideration, and payable on or before one year after date, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum. Accompanying the note was a declaration of trust by the maker, explaining the purpose of the note and naming the plaintiff trustee. No part of the principal of said note was ever paid, but interest accruing thereon in the sum of $150 was paid. The maker died before the maturity of the note, and the plaintiff as trustee presented and filed a claim based upon the note against the estate of deceased. The claim was rejected, and action followed. A demurrer to the complaint was sustained, plaintiff refused to amend, and an appeal was prosecuted from the judgment entered upon the order sustaining the demurrer. The judgment was affirmed and the case of Tracy v. Alvord, 118 Cal. 655, 50 Pac. 757, supra, was cited in support of the conclusion arrived at by the court.

Further authorities to the same effect need not be noticed herein. The purported note constituted a mere unexecuted voluntary promise, unsupported by a consideration of any kind or nature, to make a gift of money, and is a nudum pactum, imposing upon the maker no legal or enforceable obligation whatever.

[5, 6] The special defenses, involving the interposition of the statute of limitations, laches, and estoppel, are not well taken in this case. If the invalidity of an instrument in writing outstanding against a person is due to fraud or accident or mistake, we entertain no doubt but that an action under section 3412 might come within the bar of the statute, if it were not brought within the statutory period of limitation after the discovery by the person subject to be prejudicially affected by the instrument of the fraud or the accident or the mistake; and in such case the circumstances might be such as to justify the plea of laches. The present case, however, presents a much different situation. The instrument involved herein was subject to be voided at any time the maker thereof conceived it to be the more consistent with his own interests to recall it. A party might in perfect good faith give to another his note without a consideration and later discover the improvidence of such gift, or the motive or reason immediately prompting the gift might have ceased to exist, or his financial condition, through untoward circumstances arising after the gift, might have become so changed as to make the burden thereof, should he undertake to sustain it, extremely vexatious and embarrassing to him or his business interests. He is under no legal obligation to pay the note, and it is solely up to him to say at any time whether he will or will not satisfy it. It would therefore be absurd to say that either the statute of limitations or laches could be invoked against the maker of such a writing in an action to void it. Indeed, it is difficult to conceive when the statute of limitations would begin to run in such a case as this, or what equitable circumstances could arise therein in favor of the purported donee which would justify the imputation of laches against the purported donor. And what we here say respecting the statute of limitations and laches as defenses to this action is equally pertinent to the claim of estoppel against plaintiff. The mere conduct of plaintiff in permitting her bare and voluntary promise to give a certain sum of money to the minor at some future time to remain unrevoked for many years does not imply or carry with it a recognition of the legal integrity of the note. Nor does the fact that she renewed the note or the fact that she paid interest thereon have that effect. As evidence upon the question of whether there was a consideration for the note, those circumstances could properly be considered, but the moment the court found that there was no consideration given for the note, that moment their significance for any purpose was entirely destroyed.

It follows from the views thus expressed respecting the special defenses interposed against plaintiff's action that there was no necessity for specific findings upon those special pleas.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. QUIJADA. (Cr. 549.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. May 31, 1921.)

Escape ⊂=5½—Prisoner unlawfully going beyond walls guilty of "escape," and not mere attempt to escape.

Defendant, who, with other prisoners in a state prison, unlawfully seized an engine in the prison yard and drove it through a locked gate to a point outside the prison walls, was guilty of an escape within Pen. Code, § 105, relative to escapes from state prison, and not merely of an attempt to escape, though he was captured while within the territory connected with the prison grounds; an "escape" being the unlawful departure of a prisoner from the limits of his custody.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Escape.]

Appeal from Superior Court, Sacramento County; Malcolm C. Glenn, Judge.

Eugene Quijada was convicted of escaping from state's prison, and from the judgment and an order denying a new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

Merlin W. Stewart, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

BURNETT, J. Defendant was convicted of escaping from the state prison at Folsom while confined as a prisoner therein under a conviction of robbery. The prosecution was instituted under section 105 of the Penal Code, providing:

"Every person confined in a state prison, for a term less than for life, who escapes therefrom, is punishable by imprisonment in a state prison for a term of not less than one year; said second term of imprisonment to commence from the time he would otherwise have been discharged from said prison."

The only point made by appellant is that the evidence is insufficient to show more than "an attempt to escape." In this, however, we think appellant is in error.

There is evidence to show that, while defendant was working in the stoneyard of the prison, a locomotive was driven near the place, and defendant, in conjunction with two other prisoners, boarded the engine and attacked the engineer and fireman and drove them from the engine. Said prisoners then ran the engine through the prison yard and through a large gate, across the track and beyond the wall of the prison. This gate was locked with a large padlock, but they forced the engine through it and proceeded along the track until they came to a tank which is used to store oil for the engine. They stopped the engine there, got off, and set fire to the tank. They started then toward what is known as the old quarry, but were recaptured before proceeding very far, as an alarm had been given. J. W. Drullinger, one of the prison guards, testified:

"These three prisoners had set the tank on fire. They looked up and saw me, and started to run for the bank.

"Q. And this defendant was one of them? A. He was the one behind Clifford; yes, sir.

"Q. And he was through the gate and up at the oil tank when you first saw him? A. At the oil tank; yes.

"Q. And had completely made his escape from the prison proper? A. Outside of the prison wall altogether; yes, sir."

He was further asked if the defendant was out of his sight when the defendant went into the willows, and he answered:

"When he went in the willows he was out of my sight; he went in this bunch of willows; I didn't see him in there. I was taking care of the other men who were under my control until Mr. Eldridge came up there."

Albert Eldridge, another guard, testified as to the defendant:

"I first saw him right in here (showing on the diagram) in some willows, going over here back to an oil car that was in front of this engine.

"Q. Now that is all across the dead line, and out of the prison proper? A. Out through those gates.

"Q. Outside of the prison; away from it? A. Yes, sir; he had completed his escape from the prison proper? A. Yes, sir."

The term "escape" is not defined in the Code, but a definition as clear and concise as any found in the authorities is, "the unlawful departure of a prisoner from the limits of his custody." Among the cases cited under "escape" in Words and Phrases are Wheeler v. State, 39 Kan. 163, 17 Pac. 856, and Riley v. State, 16 Conn. 47. In the former it is said: "The common legal definition of the term, however, means a violation or private evasion out of some lawful custody," and in the latter it is declared:

"An 'escape' within the meaning of the law which makes it an offense to escape from the custody of the law is any departure from prison, or from the custody of an officer, which is not authorized by law."

There is no doubt that the testimony for the people herein brings this case within the doctrine of these decisions. When the defendant went beyond the prison walls without permission of the authorities he unlawfully departed from the limits of his custody, and it is immaterial that he did not get entirely beyond the territory connected with the prison grounds. It was his duty to remain within the walls as he very well knew, and when he transcended these limits he necessarily "violated his lawful custody."

We can see no merit in the appeal, and the judgment and order are affirmed.

ARRELANO v. JORGENSEN et al.
(Civ. 3840.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 13, 1921.)

1. Negligence ⟸56(3)—Violation of law must contribute directly to injury.

An act or omission constituting a violation of law, to render one liable for damages in a negligence case, must contribute directly to the injury, no matter how improper or illegal the act or omission may have been in the abstract.

2. Parent and child ⟸13(1)—Parent not liable for failure to join in child's application for motor license.

Parents were not liable, under Motor Vehicle Act, § 18, by reason of their failure to join with minor child in making an application for a license and in permitting the child to operate his automobile without an operator's license, where there was no evidence to causally connect the fact of the absence of the license with the injury sustained.

3. Municipal corporations ⟸706(5)—In suit for injuries caused by automobile colliding with wagon finding that defendant was negligent and plaintiff exercised due care sustained.

In an action for injuries caused by automobile in a collision with a wagon, evidence held to sustain a finding that defendant was negligent and plaintiff exercised due care.

4. Appeal and error ⟸1010(1) — Appellate court bound by findings supported by evidence.

The appellate court is bound by findings of the trial court, where there is evidence in the record to support them.

5. Negligence ⟸142—Finding against contributory negligence sufficient.

A finding in negligence case that plaintiff was giving due care and circumspection was a sufficient finding that plaintiff was not guilty of contributory negligence.

6. Appeal and error ⟸1071(6)—Judgment not reversed for lack of finding necessarily adverse.

A judgment will not be reversed for failure to find upon an issue, if the finding omitted would have been adverse to the appellant.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County; W. B. Wallace, Judge.

Action by Faustino Arrelano against William Jorgensen, a minor and others. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendants appeal. Affirmed as to defendant William Jorgensen and reversed as to other defendants.

W. D. Crichton, of Fresno, for appellants.
F. L. Simons, of Fresno, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendants from a judgment against them for $537 for personal injuries to the plaintiff and damages to his property caused by a collision between a horse and wagon owned and driven by the plaintiff and an automobile owned and driven by the defendant William Jorgensen. Defendants Carl and Maria Jorgensen are the father and mother, respectively, of William Jorgensen. William Jorgensen was about 18 years old at the time of the accident and had been working for several years and supporting himself, although living at the home of his parents. He owned and drove the automobile which collided with plaintiff. The accident occurred the latter part of January, 1920. William Jorgensen had had an operator's license issued to him for the year 1919, but had neglected to make application therefor in 1920. He was therefore without an operator's license at the time of the happening of the accident.

The theory of the judgment against the parents is that they are liable for permitting the boy to operate the automobile without an operator's license; he being a minor and under their direction and control. The parents denied that the boy was subject to their control, or that they had ability to prevent him from operating the machine without a license, and alleged that the son was operating the machine on his own responsibility, as his own property, in and about his employment, and otherwise, without their knowledge or consent. Upon this question the court found that—

"The parents of said minor had the custody and control of said minor; that they knew that he was operating said automobile without an operator's license, and that they failed to join with him in making an application for said license to the motor vehicle department of the state of California; that he was residing with them, and that they failed and neglected, notwithstanding their ability to do so, to prevent him from operating said automobile without having obtained the license therefor, and that they negligently consented to and negligently permitted the said minor to operate said automobile without having obtained said license."

[1] The Motor Vehicle Act (Act 2331b, St. 1917, p. 408), § 18 provides that it shall be unlawful for any person to cause or knowingly permit his or her child to operate or drive a motor vehicle upon the public highway without having first obtained an operator's license. It is upon this theory that the parents were negligent because of the violation of this provision of the ordinance that the plaintiff relies. But it is well settled that the act or omission constituting the violation of law must have contributed directly to the injury, or, however improper or illegal it may have been in the abstract, no action for damages can be founded upon it. Williams v. Southern Pac. Co., 173 Cal. at page 540, 160 Pac. 660; Driscoll v. Cable Railway Co., 97 Cal. 565, 32 Pac. 591, 33 Am. St. Rep. 203; McKune v. Santa Clara M. & L. Co., 110 Cal. 486, 42 Pac. 980; Fenn v. Clark, 11 Cal. App. 81, 103 Pac. 944; Stein v. United Railroads, 159 Cal. 368, 113 Pac. 663; Berges v. Guthrie, 197 Pac. 356.

[2] There is no evidence in the record to causally connect the fact of the absence of the license with the injuries sustained by plaintiff. By no stretch of the imagination could it be said that the plaintiff would have been saved these injuries had the operator of the automobile renewed his operator's license for the year 1920. Therefore, even if it be conceded that the parents had the full control of the son and consented to his operation of the machine without an operator's license, this violation of law on their part had nothing whatever to do with the injuries for which the plaintiff seeks to recover. As was said in Shimoda v. Bundy, 24 Cal. App. 675, 142 Pac. 109:

"One who violates an ordinance wherein a penalty is fixed for noncompliance with its provisions, may be subjected to the penalties therein prescribed, but he cannot, in addition thereto, be deprived of his civil right to recover damages, perhaps in many thousands of dollars, sustained by reason of the negligence or wrong of another, when such violation bore no relation to the injury and did not contribute in the remotest degree thereto."

This conclusion is, of course, decisive of the appeal of the defendants Carl and Maria Jorgensen, as there is no pretense that they are liable to the plaintiff upon any other theory than the one just discussed.

[3, 4] As to the defendant William Jorgensen, we find no merit in the appeal. It is urged in this behalf that the evidence shows the plaintiff to be guilty of contributory negligence. The court found that the plaintiff was in the exercise of "due care and circumspection," and that the defendant William Jorgensen was operating his automobile carelessly and negligently. These findings are, in our opinion, sustained by the evidence, for the two men on the wagon testified that when they reached the intersection of the two streets the automobile of the defendant William Jorgensen was a block away, and that the plaintiff hurried to cross. Under such circumstances, clearly, the plaintiff had the right of way, being at the intersection at a time when the defendant was a block away. The approximate speed of the defendant's car is deducible from the testimony because the automobile crashed into the plaintiff's wagon before it had crossed the street, striking it at about the front wheel, according to the testimony of the men in the wagon. Any conflict upon this point raised by the testimony of the defendant William Jorgensen does not concern us here, as we are bound by the findings where there is evidence in the record to support them.

[5, 6] Appellant objects that there is no finding upon the question of contributory negligence. The finding that the plaintiff was using due care and circumspection is, we think, sufficient. From that it would follow that he was not guilty of contributory negligence. A judgment will not be reversed for failure to find upon an issue, if the finding omitted would have been adverse to the appellant. Cross v. Thiele, 197 Pac. 974.

The judgment is reversed as to defendants Carl Jorgensen and Maria Jorgensen, and affirmed as to the defendant William Jorgensen.

DEAN v. CLARKE et al. (Civ. 3458.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. May 27, 1921.)

1. Schools and school districts ⊜146—Rule of State Board of Education in conflict with statute ineffective.

A rule adopted by the State Board of Education concerning the right of teachers to a retirement salary is of no effect if it conflicts with an act of the Legislature.

2. Schools and school districts ⊜146—Benefits of retirement law not limited to those teaching at date of act.

The benefits of the public school retirement salary law are not limited to those who were members of the teaching force of the state when the act went into effect, in view of section 18, declaring the act binding upon all teachers elected or appointed after approval of the act and who, not being in the service of the public schools at the time of its approval, were not competent to sign or deliver the statutory notification.

3. Schools and school districts ⊜146—Continuous service as teacher for 10 years preceding retirement not required; "immediately."

Under the public school teachers' retirement salary law (section 13), providing that teachers serving as such for 30 school years, at least 15 of which shall have been in the public schools of California, including the last 10 years of service immediately preceding retirement, shall be entitled to retire, it is not necessary that such 10 years should have been continuous, and it is sufficient that the last 10 years taught were spent in California, and that there was no interval between the last 10 years and the retirement; "immediately" importing without any interval.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; J. A. Allen, Judge.

Petition by William F. Dean for a writ of mandate directed to E. P. Clarke and others, as members of the State Board of Education and the Public School Teachers' Salary Fund Board. From a judgment awarding a peremptory writ, defendants appeal. Affirmed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Frank English, Deputy Atty. Gen., for appellants.

Middlecoff, Scott & Ham, of Visalia, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. This is an appeal from a judgment awarding plaintiff a peremptory writ of mandate on a petition therefor filed by him in the superior court of the state of California in and for the county of Tulare against appellants as members of the State Board of Education and the Public School Teachers' Retirement Fund Board. The court was asked to direct the Board to grant the application of the petitioner to be retired upon a retirement salary of $500 per annum, under the provision of section 13 of the Retirement Salary Act (Stats. 1913, p. 1423), approved June 16, 1913. The appellants demurred to the petition, and the demurrer was overruled. Appellants refused to answer, and judgment was rendered in favor of the petitioner, and a writ of mandate issued as prayed for with certain differences which it will be unnecessary to mention. For the purpose of this proceeding the facts alleged in the petition will be accepted as true. Those material to the issue involved are as follows: The petitioner, since the 1st day of July, 1878, has been and still is the holder of certificates and diplomas entitling him to teach in the primary grades of the public schools of this state. For 30 years prior to and including the 30th day of June, 1909, as well as during the school year of 1919, petitioner served as a legally qualified teacher in the public schools of this state. When the Teachers' Retirement Salary Act became effective in 1913, he was the holder of a life diploma to teach in this state. He signed and delivered to the superintendent of public schools of the county of Tulare a notification that he agreed to be bound by and avail himself of the benefits of the said act as provided by section 17 thereof. In 1920, after his last year's service as a teacher, he filed with the State Board of Education his application to be retired on the annual salary of $500. The Board denied his application. During the year of 1920 the sum of $1 for each month was deducted from petitioner's salary by the school officials of Fresno county as required by section 5 of the Retirement Salary Act. Petitioner filed with his application for a retirement salary an offer to pay into the appropriate fund the difference between $6 so paid in the county of Fresno and the sum of $360.

[1] The State Board of Education of California had, prior to the filing of the petition, adopted the following rule:

"The service of a teacher who was out of the profession at the time the Public School Teachers' Retirement Salary Law was passed, and who returned to teaching on or after April 8, 1918 (at which time this ruling was made), will not be considered unless such services has been full-time teaching and has been rendered under valid contract for four full school years in the district or districts where employed and at a salary not less than the usual salary of other regularly employed full-time teachers of the county or city and county."

However, this rule is of no effect if it conflicts with an act of the Legislature.

[2] It is first contended by appellants that petitioner is not entitled to relief because he was not a member of the teaching force of this state at the time the act went into effect. Section 18 of this act provides:

"This act shall be binding upon all teachers elected or appointed to teach in the public schools of this state after the approval of this act, who, not being in the service of the public schools at the time of the approval of said act, were not competent to sign or deliver the notification specified in section 17."

In view of this provision, it cannot be said that only those who are members of the teaching force in California when the act in question went into effect are entitled to claim benefits thereunder.

[3] A more difficult question is presented by appellants' second contention, which is that only those teachers are within the scope of the act who have taught for 10 years continuously and immediately prior to the filing of the application for retirement. Section 13 is the one dealing directly with the problem to be decided. It reads:

"Every public school teacher who shall have complied with all the requirements of this act, and who shall have served as a legally qualified teacher in public day or evening schools, or partly as such teacher and partly as superintendent or supervising executive or educational administrator, for at least thirty school years, at least fifteen of which shall have been in the public schools of this state, including the last ten years of service immediately preceding retirement, under a legal certificate shall be entitled to retire."

The phrase whose meaning is determinative of the question under consideration is "including the last ten years of service immediately preceding retirement." It is claimed by appellants that this provision is intended to be construed with the phrase "for at least thirty school years." Respondent insists that the phrase first quoted relates to the one immediately preceding it, which is as follows, "the last fifteen of which shall have been in the public schools of this state." Unless we read into the section language conveying the idea that the "ten years of service" must be successive years, the phrase cannot mean what the appellant contends. Taken literally, as he would have us read it, we have this provision: "The applicant must have served as a legally qualified teacher" "for at least thirty school years," "including the last ten years of service immediately preceding retirement, etc.", "at least fifteen years of which shall have been in the public schools of this state." It is plain that, to even thus rearrange these phrases, the provision still, according to its exact wording, contains no requirement that the 10 years of service must have been continuous. No reason or authority appears for rearranging the language of the law; on the contrary, as we shall point out, such a change would be opposed to the very purpose for which appellants contend, and we think, rightly, that this particular provision was enacted. The reference to "ten years of service" merely designates the number of "years of service." There is nothing in the language of section 13 to indicate that the Legislature meant that these 10 years of service must follow each other without any interrupting period of school years in which the petitioner did not teach.

It is claimed that the word "immediately" indicates that the 10 years of service must have been continuous. "Immediately" imports "without any interval." Cent. Dict.; Howell v. Gaddis, 31 N. J. Law, 313. Hence we must conclude that the Legislature intended that there must be no interval between the teacher's retirement and the last of his 10 years of service; that is to say, there must have been no interval of teaching elsewhere than in the state of California between the 10 years of service and the retirement.

The only other reason suggested by appellants to justify a judicial construction which would insert the word "continuous" into the phrase in question is that the clear purpose of the provision is to prevent a teacher who may have taught as much as 15 years in California, then having gone to another state and having taught 15 years there, returning to California for the mere purpose of securing the advantages of the act. But this purpose would be accomplished no less fully by reading the section literally as by the insertion of the word "continuous." If we hold that the "ten years of service" is to be a part of the period of 15 years which is required to have been spent in the public schools of this state, and that this refers to the "last ten years of service" of that period, the law would effectively carry out the avowed purpose, because it would then provide that these last 10 years of service of the 15 years of teaching in this state must immediately precede retirement. Without the word "continuous" or some other word indicating successiveness, appellants' contention cannot be upheld.

But it must be remembered that, in addition to the reason above assigned for the insertion of the phrase in question, another and the principal object of exacting 15 years of service in this state was to insure that the public would receive a just return for the benefit given the teacher. In regulating this matter, one year of service was adopted as the standard. It was then required that 15 such years of service must have been rendered to the public of the state of California through teaching in its public schools, and that 10 of such years of service must have been the last 10 years of teaching next before retirement.

Teachers often wish to take further work as students in some educational institution. For this purpose they may, for a period of one or more school years, not be actively engaged as teachers in our public schools. To adopt the construction of the law suggested by appellants would penalize any such attempt at self-improvement upon the part of a teacher otherwise entitled to claim the benefits of the Retirement Salary Act, and who would be classified under section 18 thereof. Again it might easily happen that one who had devoted almost all of his life to teaching, who had engaged in that work for 29 years, of which the last 9 had been spent in the schools of California, and which had been successive years, might then, for a period of one year, have been unable to find employment as a teacher in the public schools of this state. If we adopt the construction of the law urged by appellants, such a teacher would be deprived of the benefit of this act. It will be conceded that the plain reason for enacting a law of this character is to secure better public service by encouraging the employees of the public through hope and assurance of a subsistence when age has rendered them unable to earn a living for themselves, to make teaching a life work and give it their undivided attention. This object must necessarily be almost entirely defeated if the teacher were to realize that through inability to secure employment in his latter years of teaching he might lose all claim to this reward.

As we construe the law, all that is required of petitioner is that he shall have taught for 30 years as a public school teacher, that for 15 of these years he must have been employed in the public schools of the state of California, and that of these 15 years of service 10 must be the last 10 years which he taught immediately prior to retirement. If the last 10 years which he taught were all spent in California, it is not to his prejudice that intervals of one or more school years may have elapsed between some of these 10 years.

ECCLESTON v. ROSEBERG. (Civ. 3599.)

1. Judgment ⊂⊃497(1)—On collateral attack judgment must be held valid unless the judgment roll shows it to be void.

On collateral attack a judgment must be held to be valid unless the judgment roll shows it to be void—that is, void on its face.

2. Judgment ⊂⊃499—Extrinsic evidence is not admissible to contradict the judgment roll.

The judgment roll cannot on collateral attack be overcome by evidence outside the record showing that the court rendering the judgment was without jurisdiction.

3. Judgment ⊂⊃497(1)—Judgment roll held to show that trial court had jurisdiction.

Although the judgment roll was incomplete, the summons and return being missing, yet, where the allegation of the amended complaint that a guardian ad litem had been appointed for the defendant was affirmed by the implied findings of the trial court reciting due appointment, etc., the judgment roll must be deemed to show the trial court's jurisdiction; for a guardian ad litem cannot be duly appointed unless service of summons had been made on defendant pursuant to Code Civ. Proc. § 373, subd. 2.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; John W. Shenk, Judge.

Action by Doris H. Eccleston, by H. W. Eccleston, her guardian ad litem, against Estelle Roseberg, to renew a judgment. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Black, Hammack & Black, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

George H. Shreve and Cooper, Collings & Shreve, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. The complaint alleged that on the 25th day of April, 1913, a judgment was duly given and made in favor of the plaintiff and against the defendant for a stated amount. This is an action to renew that judgment. By her answer in this action the defendant denied that said former judgment was duly given or made, and alleged that the court in said former action was without jurisdiction to make or enter any judgment against the defendant. Judgment having been entered in favor of plaintiff in this action, the defendant appeals therefrom.

At the trial in this action the plaintiff introduced in evidence the judgment roll in the former action. The summons and return were missing. The original complaint in that action was filed on the 1st day of July, 1911, and alleged that the defendant was then of the age of about 13 years. An amended complaint was filed on the 5th day of October, 1912. Supplemental matter was contained therein, whereby, after stating that on the 9th day of June, 1911, the defendant was of the age of 14 years, it was alleged that S. R. Roseberg, her father, "was on the 18th day of October, 1911, duly appointed by an order of said superior court guardian ad litem for said defendant, Stella Roseberg, a minor, for the purposes of this action, and that he ever since has been and now is such guardian." On October 18, 1911, an answer to the original complaint was filed, purporting to be the answer of the defendant by her duly appointed guardian ad litem, the said S. R. Roseberg. On the 24th day of March, 1913, a stipulation was filed which, like said answer, was signed by Albert Lee Stephens, as attorney for defendant. In that stipulation it was agreed that the answer theretofore filed should stand as the answer to the amended complaint, and that any new matter inserted in the amended complaint in accordance with the stipulation be deemed denied. The judgment, in accordance with the stipulation, in its title referred to the defendant as "Estelle Roseberg, by S. R. Roseberg, Her Guardian ad Litem," and recited that Albert Lee Stephens appeared for the defendant; that, evidence having been introduced and the cause submitted, and findings of fact having been waived, the court finds that the plaintiff is entitled to judgment against the defendant in the sum stated.

At the trial of the present action the defendant objected to plaintiff's offer of the judgment roll in evidence that it was incompetent, particularly for the reason that the summons and return thereon were missing. This objection was overruled. Thereupon, the plaintiff having rested, the defendant over objection from the plaintiff, was permitted to introduce evidence to the effect that no service of summons was ever made upon her in the former action. Nevertheless the court disregarded this evidence and rendered judgment in favor of the plaintiff.

[1] Defendant's attack upon the judgment being collateral, the judgment must be held to be valid unless the judgment roll shows it to be void—unless, as the authorities put it, it is void upon its face. In determining the question, we are restricted to the evidence afforded by the judgment roll. Crouch v. H. L. Miller & Co., 169 Cal. 341, 146 Pac. 880.

[2] The judgment roll cannot, on this collateral atack, be overcome by evidence outside the record thereof showing, as against the record itself that in fact the steps necessary to acquire jurisdiction were not taken.

[3] We are of the opinion that the record of the judgment is sufficient to show that the court had jurisdiction to render and enter the same. The allegation contained in the amended complaint, which allegation was affirmed by the implied finding of the court, stated that S. R. Roseberg had been duly appointed as guardian ad litem for the defendant. Since such guardian ad litem could not have been duly appointed unless service of summons upon the defendant had first been made (section 373, subd. 2, Code Civ. Proc.), the necessary implication of the finding is that such service of summons had been made as alleged. This being so, the judgment contained the recitals of fact necessary to confer jurisdiction. As heretofore shown, such a judgment is not subject to collateral attack by evidence like that herein offered to prove want of service of process.

We find no error in the record in this action, and the judgment is affirmed.

TUTSCH v. DIRECTOR GENERAL OF RAILROADS. (Civ. 3615.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 18, 1921.)

1. Appeal and error ⟸918(1)—Presumed that an amendment was not filed until after trial of issue of law on demurrer.

In view of the presumption against error by the trial court, where plaintiff asserted that she was as a matter of right entitled under Code Civ. Proc. § 472, to amend her complaint once, it will be presumed that the amendment was not tendered until after trial of the issue raised by defendant's demurrer, the amendment being permissible if previously taken.

2. Limitation of actions ⟸124—No judgment can be maintained where action was not commenced or defendant not made party within statutory period unless there was a waiver.

Unless an action is commenced against a party within the statutory period, or unless such party by proper proceedings is made a defendant by amendment prior to the expiration of such period, no judgment can be had against such defendant, unless limitations are waived.

3. Limitation of actions ⟸182(2)—Defense must be pleaded.

The statute of limitations does not ordinarily operate by its own force as a bar, but as a defense, to be pleaded by the party invoking the benefit of its protection.

4. Limitation of actions ⟸182(2)—Government agent may not waive limitations.

Where the agent appointed by the President pursuant to federal Transportation Act, Feb. 28, 1920, against whom causes of action arising out of governmental ownership of railroads were to be brought, was not sought to be made a party until more than one year after accrual of an action arising out of governmental operation, which action, under Code Civ. Proc. Cal. § 340, had to be brought in one year, the agent, not being authorized, cannot waive the defense of limitations; hence plaintiff is not, after expiration of the year, entitled to amend the complaint by making him a party on the theory that the defense was not available unless pleaded.

5. Railroads ⟸5½, New, vol. 6A Key-No. Series—Action against federal agent not maintainable without strict compliance with statute.

Where plaintiff, who asserted a claim arising out of negligent operation of a railroad during governmental operation, attempted to maintain an action against the Director General of Railroads after termination of federal control, and did not seek to make the agent provided for by federal Transportation Act, Feb. 28, 1920, § 206, a party until after expiration of the year period within which the state law made applicable by act of Congress required it to be commenced, plaintiff is not entitled to amend, for, the statute being a special one, strict compliance therewith is necessary.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Monroe, Judge.

Action by Marie Tutsch against the Director General of Railroads. From a judgment dismissing the action, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Jack Greenberg, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Fred E. Pettit, Jr., and E. E. Bennett, both of Los Angeles (A. S. Halsted, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for respondent.

SHAW, J. Plaintiff appeals from a judgment dismissing the action, which followed an order of the court sustaining a general demurrer to the complaint and an order granting defendant's motion to dismiss.

It appears from the complaint that on July 24, 1919, plaintiff, due to the negligence of the Los Angeles & Salt Lake Railroad Company, sustained personal injuries, and for the recovery of damages therefor she, on July 23, 1920, filed a complaint wherein the Director General of Railroads of the United States was made sole defendant. In due time said defendant filed his demurrer and motion to dismiss the action. On the day of the hearing of the demurrer and motion, plaintiff, as shown by the record, without leave of court, filed an amendment to the complaint wherein she alleged:

"That John Barton Payne was, under the Transportation Act of 1920, §§ 205, 206, designated agent by the President of the United States of America, for the purpose of being a party defendant in actions brought against the Los Angeles & Salt Lake Railroad Company, as set forth in the complaint, and that said agent, John Barton Payne be, and that he is hereby, made a party defendant with the Director General of the Railroads of the United States in the above entitled cause."

At the hearing the demurrer was sustained and the motion granted.

The alleged injury was sustained on July 24, 1919, at which time the Los Angeles & Salt Lake Railroad was, pursuant to an act of Congress and proclamation of the President, under federal control, and operated by the Director General of Railroads of the United States. Under an act of Congress adopted February 28, 1920 (Chapter 91, 41 Stat. 456), such control and right to operate the railroad terminated on March 1, 1920. Subdivision (a) of section 206 of this last act provides that actions at law based on causes of action arising out of the possession, use, or control by the President of the railroad or system of transportation of any carrier of such character as prior to federal control could have been brought against such carrier may, after the termination of federal control, be brought against the agent designated by the President for such purpose, which agent shall be designated by the President within 30 days after the passage of this act; and that—

"Such actions, suits, or proceedings may, within the periods of limitation now prescribed by state or federal statutes, but not later than two years from the date of the passage of this act, be brought in any court which, but for federal control, would have had jurisdiction of the cause of action had it arisen against such carrier."

Pursuant to the authority conferred by subdivision (a), the President designated John Barton Payne as the agent against whom actions of the character here involved should be brought. It thus appears that when the complaint herein was filed on July 23, 1920, no warrant of law existed for suing the Director General of Railroads on account of the injury sustained by plaintiff, and hence the complaint stated no cause of action against him. Subdivision 3 of section 340, Code of Civil Procedure, provides that the period for commencing an action for damages sustained by reason of the wrongful act or negligence of another is one year; hence, when plaintiff, on August 17, 1920, sought to amend her complaint by making John Barton Payne the party defendant, more than one year had elapsed subsequent to the date of the injury; and since, by subdivision (a) of section 206, such actions are required to be brought within the period of limitation prescribed by the Code, the action, unless the complaint was subject to such amendment, was, as to such proposed defendant, barred by the statute.

[1] Appellant, basing her claim upon section 472, Code of Civil Procedure, insists that she, as a matter of right, was entitled to file the amendment. This section provides that a pleading may be amended once by the party of course at any time before answer or demurrer filed, or after demurrer filed and before trial of the issue of law thereon. It is a well-recognized principle that every intendment is in favor of the regularity of the court's ruling, and, since error will not be presumed, it devolves upon an appellant to affirmatively show the existence thereof. Hence, assuming (but, since under the circumstances made to appear we entertain grave doubts upon the question, not so deciding) that plaintiff was entitled, under section 472, to amend the complaint as of right by making John Barton Payne in such representative capacity the defendant, thus substituting a new action for that brought against the Director General of Railroads of the United States, her right so to do was by said section of the Code restricted to a time before the trial of the issue of law presented by defendant's demurrer. As appears from the record, the demurrer was heard and the order of dismissal made on August 17th, on which date plaintiff's amendment to the complaint was filed. Whether or not the filing thereof preceded the trial of the issue of law upon defendant's demurrer is not made to appear, and, assuming the correctness of plaintiff's contention as to her right to amend before trial, nevertheless, since we cannot assume the court erred, we must, in the absence of a showing that the filing of the amendment preceded the trial of the issue of law so presented, presume in support of the court's ruling that it was thereafter filed.

[2] It appears that after the judgment was rendered on August 24th plaintiff applied to the court, under the provisions of section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, for an order vacating and setting aside the same, and allowing plaintiff to file the amendment to the complaint, which application was by the court denied. In so ruling it is claimed the court abused its discretion. That the court may in furtherance of justice allow a party to amend any pleading by adding the name of a party is provided by said section. The general rule is that, unless an action is commenced against a party within the statutory period, or unless such party is by proper proceedings made a defendant by amendment prior to the expiration of such period, no judgment can be had against such defendant, unless the statute is waived. Frost v. Witter, 132 Cal. 421, 64 Pac. 705, 84 Am. St. Rep. 53; Peiser v. Griffin, 125 Cal. 9, 57 Pac. 690.

[3-5] The rule that the statute of limitations does not operate by its own force as a bar, but as a defense to be pleaded by the party invoking the benefit of its protection, has, in our opinion, no application to a suit of this character. Finn v. United States, 123 U. S. 227, 8 Sup. Ct. 82, 31 L. Ed. 128. While an individual may waive such a defense, no authority, either express or implied, was conferred upon John Barton Payne, as such agent and in a representative capacity, to waive the limitation, and, hence, since the statute constituted a defense which he could not waive, no purpose could have been served by permitting the amendment of the complaint. Moreover, other than as authorized by section 206 of the federal Transportation Act, no warrant existed for suing John Barton Payne as such agent, and, since plaintiff in bringing the action sought to avail herself of the privilege so granted by special act, in order to maintain the same, she must have strictly complied with the terms and conditions embodied in the statute, one of the provisions of which is that such suits must be brought within the period there specified, which, as applied to this case, is one year from the date of the injury. Carr v. United States, 98 U. S. 433, 25 L. Ed. 209; Price v. United States, 174 U. S. 373, 19 Sup. Ct. 765, 43 L. Ed. 1011; section 52, vol. 25, p. 416. Ruling Case Law.

Our conclusion is that no cause of action was stated against the defendant named in the complaint; that no amendment to the complaint was filed under section 472, Code of Civil Procedure, until after the trial of the issue presented by defendant's demurrer to the complaint; that at the time plaintiff, under section 473, Code of Civil Procedure, applied to the court to set aside the judgment and allow her to file an amendment to the complaint making John Barton Payne a party defendant, the action as to him was barred by the statute of limitations, and, hence, there was no abuse of discretion on the part of the court, and that plaintiff has suffered no prejudicial error by reason of any of the rulings of the court.

The judgment is affirmed.

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. May 24, 1921.)

1. New trial ⊜76(2)—Action for money had and received is an "action for damages," within statute authorizing new trial for excessive "damages."

An action in assumpsit for money had and received is an "action for damages," within Code Civ. Proc. § 657, subd. 5, authorizing the granting of a new trial on the ground of "excessive damages appearing to have been given under the influence of passion or prejudice," in view of Civ. Code, §§ 3281, 3300.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Damage —Damages.]

2. New trial ⊜76(1)—Granting of for excessive damages discretionary with court.

The granting of a new trial on the ground of excessive damages, under Code Civ. Proc. § 657, subd. 5, is discretionary with the court.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; S. M. Marsh, Judge.

Action by Walter Harp against Clifford C. Pease. Verdict for plaintiff. From an order granting a new trial, the plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Wright & McKee, of San Diego, for appellant.

C. C. Pease and A. T. Roark, both of San Diego, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. The action is in assumpsit for $597.76 for money had and received. Defendant, by way of counterclaim, alleges a contract of employment of himself by plaintiff and a breach of the contract, in that the services rendered had not been paid for. The jury returned a verdict for the plaintiff for the sum of $354.50. Defendant moved for a new trial on all of the statutory grounds. The court set aside the verdict of the jury and granted the motion for a new trial. The order indicates that, among other grounds, it is based upon "excessive damages appearing to have been given under the influence of passion or prejudice." From this order the plaintiff appeals.

[1] It is urged that the action is not one to recover damages, within the meaning of subdivision 5 of section 657, Code of Civil Procedure, and that the trial court had no authority to grant the motion under that subdivision. Appellant cites no authority to sustain this contention. Robinson on Elementary Law, § 262, defines an action in assumpsit as one to recover damages for the breach of an implied contract, etc. Among other implied contracts there mentioned is that of money had and received, which the same author defines as:

"An agreement of one who receives another's money, without giving valuable consideration for it, to pay it over to that other on demand."

These elementary principles are sufficient to establish the proposition that the action in the case at bar is for damages. The Legislature has seen fit in the Code section above mentioned to provide that a new trial may be granted, among other grounds, upon that of "excessive damages appearing to have been given under the influence of passion or prejudice." It is doubtless true that in the great majority of cases, where this ground for a new trial is relied upon, the action sounds in tort, yet, in the absence of any language in the Code section itself which could properly be construed as indicating such an intention upon the part of the Legislature, we would be going far, indeed, to exclude from the scope of the word "damages" all reference to damages arising from breach of contract.

Section 3281, Civil Code, defines damages in the following provision:

"Every person who suffers detriment from the unlawful act or omission of another may recover from the person in fault a compensation therefor in money, which is called 'damages.'"

Section 3300, Civil Code, provides:

"For the breach of an obligation arising from contract, the measure of damages, except where otherwise expressly provided by this Code, is the amount which will compensate the party aggrieved for all the detriment proximately caused thereby, or which, in the ordinary course of things, would be likely to result therefrom."

In the absence of some suggestion in some expression of the Legislature to indicate that in enacting subdivision 5 of section 657, Code of Civil Procedure, it intended to subtract from the content of the word "damages," as elsewhere used in the Codes, all such damages as occur by reason of a breach of contract, it cannot be said that such a limitation was contemplated. It is stated in 29 Cyc. 843:

"In actions for breach of contract, or for injuries for the detention of property, where there is a definite measure of damages, new trials will be more readily granted on the ground of excessive recovery."

This editorial comment is not quoted from any particular case, but from the author's conclusions from a review of many decisions.

[2] It is not necessary to consider other grounds or to decide whether or not the order of the court was adequate if based upon insufficiency of evidence to justify the verdict. The trial court had the right, in its discretion, to grant the order upon the ground that the damages were excessive. Ingraham v. Weidler, 139 Cal. 588, 73 Pac. 415; Davis v. Southern Pac. Co., 98 Cal. 13, 32 Pac. 646; Etchas v. Orena, 121 Cal. 270, 53 Pac. 798; Angelo-Nevada Assurance Society v. Ross, 123 Cal. 520, 56 Pac. 335. The record shows no abuse of this discretion.

The judgment is affirmed.

1. Sales ⊂=84—Contract for sale of waste held not to obligate seller to remain in business or produce any definite amount of waste.

A contract by a firm for the sale of fish waste, though declaring that it should be in force and effect for 10 years, did not obligate the firm to remain in business for any specified length of time or produce any given quantity of waste.

2. Corporations ⊂=590(2)—Purchase by one corporation of property of another does not of itself impose on purchaser liability for seller's contracts.

Where one corporation purchases the entire property of another, such purchase is not different from a similar contract between individuals, and the purchaser is not liable on the contracts of the seller unless such liability is voluntarily assumed.

3. Corporations ⊂=590(2)—Corporation purchasing property of another held not liable on contract of predecessor.

Where a partnership entered into a contract with plaintiff's predecessor in title for the sale of fish waste for a period of 10 years and a corporation was formed which carried on the business of the firm and accepted the contract, a second corporation which acquired the property of the first corporation is not liable on the contract, not having assumed it either expressly or impliedly.

SHAW, J. Action to recover damages for the alleged breach of a contract. Judgment went for defendant, from which plaintiff has appealed.

It appears from the contract, executed on October 17, 1912, a copy of which is set out in the complaint, that the California Tunny Canning Company was engaged in the business of canning fresh fish for market and desirous of disposing of the waste product therefrom, and that John T. Gaffey was engaged in manufacturing fertilizer from such waste product and desired to purchase the same; whereupon the California Tunny Canning Company agreed to sell, and Gaffey agreed to buy, for $1 per ton, all the fish waste, consisting of fish heads, bones, tails, and such other fish waste as was not put into cans by said California Tunny Canning Company, which fish waste, under the terms of the contract, the seller was to place in barges to be furnished by Gaffey, who, after the same were loaded, was to remove the same within 12 hours thereafter, and, in case of failure so to do, the said canning company was authorized, at the expense of Gaffey, to employ a tug to tow the barges out to sea and dump such waste material into the water. While, under the terms of the contract, no obligation was imposed upon the seller of such fish waste to continue the business of canning fish, or, if it did, to produce any specified quantity of such product, it was "agreed that this agreement shall be and remain in force and effect for the period of ten years from the date thereof."

It is alleged in the complaint that plaintiff, by mesne assignments and transfers executed prior to the commencement of the action, acquired all the right, title, and interest of Gaffey in and to the contract, together with all rights, claims, demands, and causes of action growing out of the same, or anything done or to be done thereunder, followed by an allegation that defendant, on or about April 30, 1914, became the assignee and successor in interest of the California Tunny Canning Company in and to said contract, and at said time assumed all the covenants and obligations contained in said contract on the part of said California Tunny Canning Company, and ever since said date, up to about September 1, 1917, defendant performed all the covenants and conditions contained in the contract on the part of said California Tunny Canning Company, but since said September 1, 1917, defendant has, without the consent of plaintiff, wholly failed, refused and neglected to deliver to plaintiff's predecessor in interest, or to plaintiff, any of the fish waste referred to in the contract, or to perform any of the acts thereby required to be performed on its part as such assignee and in accordance with its obligation so to do, but used the fish waste for its own purposes, business, and profit, followed by allegations as to the amount of fish waste produced by defendant and which it refused to deliver to plaintiff, who at all times on its part was ready, willing, and able to carry out the terms of the contract.

The chief contention upon which plaintiff bases its claim for a reversal of the judgment is insufficiency of the evidence to justify the finding of the court to the effect that it is not true that on April 30, 1914, or at any other time or at all, the Van Camp Sea Food Company, defendant herein, became the assignee or successor in interest of said California Tunny Canning Company in or to said contract, and it is not true that at said time or at any time assumed the obligation to perform all or any of the covenants contained therein on the part of said California Tunny Canning Company as one of the makers of the contract, nor is it true that prior to September 1, 1917, defendant performed or carried out all or any of the covenants or conditions therein contained, or received any of the benefits thereof.

The evidence, as disclosed by the record, clearly tends to establish certain facts, among which are: That at the time of the execution of the contract Paul Eachus and W. F. Wood constituted a copartnership, doing business under the name and style of the California Tunny Canning Company, one of the parties to the contract, and that as made it was with them as such copartners; that on January 8, 1914, a corporation, designated the California Tunny Canning Company, was created, with a capital stock of $50,000, divided into shares of $100 each, and, excepting two shares thereof, the stock was equally divided between Eachus and Wood, theretofore constituting the copartnership. Other than a stipulation "that title passed to the California Tunny Canning Company, a corporation, of all the assets of the California Tunny Canning Company, a copartnership, on or about the 8th of January, 1914," there is nothing whatsoever disclosed by the record showing any transfer, by assignment or otherwise, of the interest of the copartnership in and to the contract in question.

On April 22, 1914, Frank Van Camp, Paul Eachus, and F. H. Ford entered into a contract whereby they agreed to form a corporation for the purpose of conducting a fisheries, canning, manufacturing, and mercantile business, to be named the Van Camp Sea Food Company, with a capital of $200,000, divided into 2,000 shares of the par value of $100 each, and wherein it was agreed that Frank Van Camp should receive, for the use of his name, 1,000 shares of said stock, and that Paul Eachus, who subsequent to the incorporation of the California Tunny Canning Company had acquired the interest therein of W. F. Wood, should turn over to the Van Camp corporation all of the corporate stock of the California Tunny Canning Company, together with the plant and equipment thereof, including all merchandise, accounts receivable, the lease of the ground belonging to the Southern Pacific Company, now held by the California Tunny Canning Company, and all interest in or leases on machinery and equipment belonging thereto, whether the same stands in the name of the California Tunny Canning Company or that of Paul Eachus, "subject to all indebtedness, contracts, or obligations of the said California Tunny Canning Company," for which he should receive 500 shares of the stock of said Van Camp Sea Food Company, and that Frank Van Camp and F. H. Ford should jointly furnish to said last-named company the sum of $50,000 in cash, for which there should be issued to them 500 shares of stock therein. In accordance with this agreement, the Van Camp Sea Food Company, defendant herein, was duly organized, and at a meeting held on April 30, 1914, as shown by the minutes of the proceedings of the board of directors, consisting of Frank Van Camp, Gilbert Van Camp, Paul Eachus, Wilbur F. Wood, and F. H. Ford, the agreement under which said corporation was organized was presented, and a statement made by one of the directors that the corporation was formed and organized pursuant thereto, whereupon the agreement was approved, and the president and secretary ordered to issue and deliver to Frank Van Camp 1,000 shares of the stock of the corporation, and to issue and deliver to Paul Eachus 500 shares upon a transfer of the property to be conveyed by him in accordance with the agreement, and to Frank Van Camp and F. H. Ford 500 shares of stock upon the payment therefor of $50,000, as provided in said agreement.

There were several assignments of the interest of John T. Gaffey in and to the contract prior to July 16, 1917, at which time, by a naked assignment, it was acquired by the Globe Cotton Seed Oil Mills, which, however, assumed none of the obligations imposed by the contract upon Gaffey, and this last-named company, on November 14, 1917, by naked deed of assignment, sold and transferred the same, together with "all rights thereunder against the Van Camp Sea Food Company," to plaintiff, who likewise assumed none of the obligations imposed by the contract upon Gaffey. It further appears from the evidence that at the time of the organization of defendant corporation it had no notice of the existence of said contract, and that while it did, prior to September 1, 1917, deliver fish waste to plaintiff's purported predecessors in interest in said contract, it at all times denied any obligation so to do, and did for most of the period, up to the time that it ceased such deliveries, exact from plaintiff's predecessors in interest payment therefor at the rate of $2.60 per ton for said fish waste, although in so doing it appears that there existed a controversy between the parties as to their respective rights under the terms of the contract, plaintiff's predecessor in interest therein claiming that it was entitled to the fish waste at the price of $1 per ton, notwithstanding which fact it, in obedience to the demand of defendant, who refused to recognize the contract, paid $2.60 per ton therefor, as a result of which fact it was, on July 10, 1917, agreed between the parties that the rights of neither should be prejudiced by reason of such payments.

[1] As we construe the contract, it imposed no obligation upon the copartnership of Eachus and Wood, as parties thereto, to continue in business, or, if they did, to produce any specified quantity of fish waste. Hence they might, without violating the terms thereof, have ceased doing business the day following its execution, or, if they continued therein, reduced the output to a few pounds per day. In effect, it required them, so long as they conducted the business, to sell such fish waste as they produced to Gaffey for $1 per ton; and while, in case of his default, an action would lie thereon against him for the agreed price, and, in case he neglected to remove it, the additional cost of towing the fish waste to sea, no such right of action existed against the plaintiff for the reason that, under the naked assignment, it assumed none of the obligations imposed upon Gaffey. The California Tunny Canning Company, copartnership, as it had the right to do, ceased operations; and, assuming that under the stipulation of counsel its interest in the contract was transferred to the corporation of like name, this corporation assumed no obligation to perform the conditions thereof; and, assuming further that it was a substituted agency of Eachus and Wood through which to conduct the business, then it had the same right to cease business as did the copartnership. In effect, it exercised such right by ceasing operations and selling its assets to defendant, which, as a corporation organized with a capital of four times that of the California Tunny Canning Company, issued to Eachus, who at the time had acquired substantially all interest in said last-named corporation, 500 shares of its stock in payment therefor, and the conduct of the business and existence of the corporation terminated. Upon these facts counsel for appellant insists that defendant corporation was but a continuance of the California Tunny Canning Company, and, in effect, a consolidation or merger of two corporations, by reason of which facts defendant, under the terms of the contract, was legally bound to deliver to it all the fish waste produced by it during the term specified therein. We cannot assent to this proposition. On the contrary, it clearly appears that a new, separate, and distinct corporation was formed, which, in consideration of the issuance of 500 shares of its stock, purchased the assets of the California Tunny Canning Company, but did not assume the performance of the contract.

[2] In the absence of statutory regulation, "the purchase by one corporation of the property of another is not different in law from a similar contract between individuals. * * * In neither case is the vendee liable for the * * * contractual obligations of the vendor, unless such liability was voluntarily assumed by the former." 7 Ruling Case Law, p. 156. There is neither allegation nor proof of any fraud in the transaction; there was no agreement whatsoever on the part of defendant to assume performance of the contract; and there is nothing in the circumstances surrounding the transaction tending to show a consolidation of the two corporations.

[3] Our conclusion is that the contract imposed no obligation upon Eachus and Wood, as individuals constituting the corpartnership, to continue in business, and that, by the mere naked transfer thereof, no additional obligation was imposed upon the California Tunny Canning Company, which was free to discontinue the business; and, conceding the transfer of assets of the last-named corporation to defendant to have included the contract as part thereof and made "subject to all * * * contracts or obligations of the California Tunny Canning Company," such provision could not be construed as creating an obligation on the part of defendant to deliver all the fish waste produced by it to plaintiff. Moreover, since the obligation imposed upon the California Tunny Canning Company ended with its cessation of business, there was no obligation imposed upon defendant, and hence none to which the transfer was subject.

In our opinion, the facts established warranted the court in making the finding upon which the judgment is founded.

The court also made a finding that, as alleged in the answer, the cause of action was barred by a judgment rendered in a former suit between the parties and involving the same matters here litigated. In view, however, of what has been said, no purpose could be served in discussing this alleged error, since, conceding the insufficiency of the evidence to support it, such fact could not affect the conclusion reached.

The judgment is affirmed.

PEOPLE v. DE VRIES. (Cr. 950.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. May 19, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 18, 1921.)

1. Perjury ⊂⊃19(2)—Indictment held sufficiently specific.

A perjury indictment for defendant's falsely testifying before the grand jury that he did not accept bribes, alleging the transaction to have been "during the year 1919," held not invalid for uncertainty, since it set forth the parties paying the bribes, the amounts, and the purposes with sufficient particularity to inform defendant of what was intended, and what evidence might confront him in proof of the falsity of his testimony.

2. Perjury ⊂⊃19(3)—Indictment held defective because of demurrable omnibus clause.

An omnibus allegation in an indictment charging defendant with falsely swearing that he did not accept bribes, alleging that defendant took bribes from "divers persons to the grand jury unknown," and did various other unlawful acts and things, is indefensible, and a demurrer thereto for uncertainty should have been sustained.

3. Criminal law ⊂⊃1169(1)—Testimony, if inadmissible, held harmless, where other evidence required verdict rendered.

In a prosecution for perjury, evidence probably introduced under a defective omnibus clause of an indictment held not to require a reversal, even in case it were not admissible under some other part of the indictment, where it tended to prove the falsity of the testimony in question, and there was other evidence from which the jury could have reached no other verdict than that of guilt.

4. Criminal law ⊂⊃1130(2)—Where appellant gave no reasons why his demurrer should have been sustained, the matter need not be decided.

Where appellant has failed to give any reasons why his demurrer to certain counts of the indictment should have been sustained, and they are not subject to the objections he has urged against the first count, and to determine his contention would necessitate an independent examination and inquiry, this court need not decide such matter.

5. Perjury ⊂⊃32(8), 36—In prosecution for defendant's falsely testifying he had not accepted a bribe, evidence need not be rejected for uncertainty as to time of payment, and question was for the jury.

In a prosecution for perjury for defendant's falsely testifying before the grand jury that he had not accepted bribes, held, that the testimony that witness had paid defendant money in 1918, together with a bank clerk's testimony that witness drew that amount from the bank early in the next year, was not to be rejected for uncertainty as to exact time when the bribe was paid, as the witnesses may have been mistaken, and such matter was for the jury.

6. Perjury ⊂⊃32(8)—In prosecution for defendant's falsely testifying he had not received bribes, where witness testified he withdrew money from deposit box, bank clerk could testify witness had a deposit box.

In a prosecution for perjury for defendant's falsely testifying that he had not accepted bribes, where a witness testified that he withdrew an amount of money from his safe deposit box and paid it to the defendant on the next day, there was no error in allowing the bank clerk to testify that the witness had a safe deposit box in the bank.

7. Criminal law ⊂⊃829(14), 1173(2)—Refusal to give instruction held harmless, where relating to matters known to jury and covered by charge given.

In a perjury prosecution, defendant was not harmed by a refusal to instruct on counsel's right to object to evidence and move to strike, and that the jury should disregard testimony stricken, where the major part of the instruction related to matters common to the conduct of every trial and with which the jurors were already familiar, while the remaining portion was covered elsewhere in the charge.

8. Criminal law ⊂⊃829(12)—Refusing instruction, sufficiently covered by others, not error.

Defendant appellant's proposed instruction that, if the testimony failed to establish proof of any of the elements of perjury as defined, it was the jurors' duty to acquit, was properly rejected, where fully and fairly covered by other instructions.

9. Criminal law ⊂⊃1172(2)—Instruction to disregard other charges pending against defendant or witnesses held not prejudicial error.

In a prosecution for perjury before the grand jury by defendant's falsely swearing that he had not accepted bribes, an instruction not to consider the fact that there might be pending against the defendant, or any other witnesses, other charges growing out of the same or other transactions, held not prejudicial error, in view of the record.

10. Criminal law ⊂⊃1037(1)—Objection to district attorney's conduct, made after he had concluded, need not be reviewed.

Assignments of misconduct by the district attorney in argument, not made until after he had concluded, need not be considered on appeal.

11. Criminal law ⊂⊃721(2), 1037(1), 1171(3)—District attorney's reference to limited examination of defendant held erroneous, but not prejudicial and does not require reversal, where not objected to.

In a prosecution for perjury before the grand jury by defendant's denying that he had accepted bribes, held, that the district attorney's remark as to the limited examination of the defendant was clearly error; but since there was no assignment thereon made at the time, and the evidence clearly established defendant's guilt, reversal for that reason alone is not required.

12. Criminal law ⟸1186(4)—Provision that cases be reversed only for miscarriage of justice does not apply to district attorney's intentional misconduct.

Const. art. 6, § 4½, providing that criminal cases need not be reversed, where the error complained of has not resulted in the miscarriage of justice, does not extend to intentional misconduct on the part of a prosecuting attorney.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Michael J. Roche, Judge.

John De Vries was convicted of perjury, and from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial, he appeals. Judgment and order affirmed.

Frank M. Carr, of Oakland, and Chas. H. Brennan, of San Francisco, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and John H. Riordan, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

WASTE, P. J. The defendant was indicted on four counts for the crime of perjury. His demurrer to the indictment was overruled. He was tried, convicted on the first, third, and fourth counts, and sentenced to imprisonment in the state prison. He appeals from the judgment, and from the order denying his motion for a new trial, urging as reasons for a reversal that the court erred in overruling the demurrer to the indictment, in its decisions on questions of law arising during the course of the trial, and that the court misdirected the jury. Alleged misconduct of the district attorney during the course of the trial, and in his closing argument to the jury, is assigned by the defendant as prejudicial error.

The allegation of the first count of the indictment is that the defendant swore falsely as to material matter while a witness under oath before the grand jury of the city and county of San Francisco, in an investigation of the charge that the defendant and others, in their capacity as inspectors for the state board of pharmacy, took and received bribes from, and were guilty of official misconduct with, persons suspected or accused of violating the laws with respect to the use and disposition of narcotics. The alleged false testimony is set out in full in the count. The defendant was not examined as to any specific acts; the questions being directed to the fact if he "ever" received any bribes, or was "ever" guilty of misconduct as charged, to all of which he entered a positive denial. These allegations are followed by the averments that the testimony was and is false, and was known to the defendant to be untrue. In addition to the general assignment of perjury, the count contains a statement of particular facts from which it is made to appear that De Vries did accept money from a number of persons, and was otherwise guilty of the gross official misconduct for which he was under investigation by the grand jury. It was positively alleged that "during the year 1919" L. L. Gantz, Sam Shurgin, and Sam Morlen, alias David Ross, illicit vendors and dealers in narcotics, paid defendant varying sums of money "for the purpose of corruptly influencing and affecting him in the discharge of his duties" as inspector for the state board of pharmacy. There is a further allegation that "said De Vries did solicit, take, and receive money and other valuable divers things from divers persons, to this grand jury unknown," and that said "John De Vries did do and perform various other unlawful acts and things hereinbefore specified."

[1] The defendant interposed a general and special demurrer to this count, upon the ground that it fails to comply with the sections of the Penal Code requiring an indictment to contain a statement of the acts constituting the offense in ordinary and concise language, and in such manner as to enable a person of common understanding to know what is intended. The demurrer was overruled, and appellant renews the objection on this appeal. There is nothing in the contention that the indictment is uncertain in not specifying the exact time and place at which Gantz, Shurgin, and Morlen paid the money to appellant. It was alleged to have been "during the year 1919," it is true; but the parties paying, the amounts, and the purpose for which they were paid, were set forth with sufficient particularity to inform the defendant as to what was intended, and what evidence of particular acts might confront him at the trial in proof of the falsity of his testimony, which was the only offense charged against him by the indictment.

[2] There is more merit in appellant's arraignment of the omnibus allegations that the defendant took bribes from "divers persons to the grand jury unknown," and did "various other unlawful acts and things." Such a plea in an indictment is indefensible, and the demurrer for uncertainty should have been sustained. People v. Bradbury, 155 Cal. 808, 811, 103 Pac. 215. Did the sufficiency of the first count of the indictment depend solely upon that allegation, its uncertainty would be fatal. But, as the other allegations of the indictment meet the requirements of the law, and the record clearly establishes the guilt of the defendant, it is only necessary to determine whether or not the appellant was prejudicially injured by the overruling of the demurrer for uncertainty.

[3] The witnesses Gantz, Morlen, and Shurgin each testified positively to paying money to the defendant, as alleged in the indictment. They were corroborated by the direct word of other witnesses and circumstantial evidence. There can be no doubt as to defendant's guilt. He complains that he was confronted with a number of other witnesses, whose identity and the nature of whose testimony were not disclosed by the indictment. Two of these witnesses, Miller and Solomon, connected the appellant with Morlen, and their testimony was properly admitted. The witnesses Dolan, Attix and Mrs. Attix testified to matters not specified in the indictment, but which conclusively established defendant's connection with the illicit sale and disposition of drugs. The witness Silverstein, another dealer in drugs and narcotics, testified that for a time he had paid the defendant $60 per month to secure his dismissal upon being arrested, and for further protection in his illegal business. Whether this testimony was admissible under the rule permitting evidence of similar offenses to be received for the purpose of showing guilty knowledge and intent, as contended by the Attorney General, which seems doubtful in this case, or whether it was admitted by the court under an apparent mistake as to the value of the omnibus allegation in the indictment, it seems clear to us that it was but cumulative to other evidence which established the guilt of the defendant beyond all reasonable doubt. Besides, it did tend to prove that the defendant swore falsely before the grand jury. On the whole record we do not see how the jury could have reached any other verdict, even though the testimony had been rejected.

[4] Appellant has failed to give any reasons why his demurrer to counts 3 and 4 of the indictment should have been sustained. They are not subject to the objection urged against the first count, and to determine whether or not there is merit in appellant's contention would necessitate an independent examination and inquiry as to the correctness of the court's ruling, which we are not required to make. People v. Woon Tuck Wo, 120 Cal. 294, 297, 52 Pac. 833; People v. Castro, 183 Pac. 828.

[5, 6] Gantz testified he paid defendant $700 in 1918. The witness Buckley, chief clerk of the Bank of Italy, testified that Gantz drew that amount from his bank account on February 4, 1919. Appellant contends that this last testimony should have been rejected, for the reason that there was uncertainty, and some improbability, as to the exact time the bribe was paid. Both Gantz and the witness Zeh may have been mistaken as to the dates testified to by them. That was a matter for the consideration of the jury. The witness Morlen testified that he withdrew $5,000 from his safe deposit box in the Anglo-California Trust Company on January 6, 1919, and paid the amount to appellant on the next day. There was, therefore, no error in allowing McRow, the clerk of the bank, to testify that Morlen had a safe deposit box in the vaults of the bank, and that he visited it on January 6.

[7-9] The appellant was not harmed by the refusal of the court to give an instruction relating to the right of counsel to object to the introduction of evidence, and to move to strike it out if so advised, and that the jury should disregard any testimony stricken from the record. The major part of the instruction related to matters common to the conduct of every trial, with which the jurors were already familiar, and the remaining portion was covered elsewhere in the charge. Appellant's proposed instruction that if the testimony failed to establish proof of any of the elements necessary to constitute the crime of perjury, as defined by the court, it was the duty of the jurors to acquit him, was fully covered with great particularity in the charge, which was comprehensive and fair. The court instructed the jury that it should not take into consideration, in arriving at a verdict, the fact that there might be pending against the defendant, or any other witness, other charges growing out of the same or other transactions. Just what was the purpose of the instruction and to what point it was considered material is not apparent. Whether directed to the credibility of the witnesses, or to the likelihood of the guilt of the defendant, does not appear. The instruction, however, appears to have done no harm. Appellant has not shown that it did. So far as we are aware, he was under no other charge than the one for which he was being tried, and several of the witnesses were.

[10-12] Complaint is made that the district attorney was guilty of misconduct in the argument to the jury. With one exception, it appears that the assignments of such conduct as error were not made until after the district attorney had concluded. The court is therefore not bound to consider them on appeal. People v. MacDonald, 167 Cal. 545, 551, 140 Pac. 256. We have examined the record, however, and, while it is manifest the district attorney did go afield in his remarks, no flagrant misconduct appears except in one instance—when he referred to the limited examination of the defendant. That was clearly error. People v. McGungill, 41 Cal. 429; People v. Derwae, 155 Cal. 592, 102 Pac. 266. But in view of the fact that no assignment of the remarks as misconduct was made at the time, and in view of the further fact that the evidence against the defendant so clearly establishes his guilt, we feel we should not reverse the judgment for that reason alone. People v. Nakis (Sup.) 193 Pac. 92. The records in appealed criminal cases disclose an increasing persistence on the part of prosecuting attorneys to go beyond the line of proper conduct in their arguments. So frequently is this being done that, while we disavow any imputation of willful misconduct in the instant case, we are becoming convinced that overzealous prosecutors sometimes do it intentionally, and rely on the appellate court to save a conviction by the application of section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution. There are bounds beyond which the saving grace of that provision may not pass, and the appellate courts should not be called upon to spread it, like "a mantle of sweet charity" over intentional acts of misconduct. Frequent warnings in relation to the practice proving ineffectual, reversals on appeal must be anticipated if right of defendants to a fair trial is to prevail.

The judgment and the order denying a new trial are affirmed.

O'NEILL v. WILLIAMS, City Auditor. (Civ. 3634.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. May 25, 1921.)

1. Officers ⟸94—Wrongfully removed public officer entitled to salary during exclusion from performance of duties on reversal of removal.

A public officer or employee wrongfully removed from office is entitled upon the reversal of his removal to the salary of the position during the time he was excluded from the performance of his duties by the erroneous order of suspension.

2. Municipal corporations ⟸184(3)—Adoption of ordinance reducing number of corporals held to create vacancy in position held by corporal.

Where the city charter empowered the council to fix the number of officers in the police department according to its judgment of the needs of the department, the adoption of an ordinance reducing the number of corporals from 14 to 7, pending a corporal's appeal from an erroneous order of suspension, and the appointment of others to the seven positions provided for by such ordinance, created a vacancy in the position held by such corporal, notwithstanding reversal of order of suspension by civil service commission.

3. Municipal corporations ⟸180(3)—Council held empowered to reduce number of corporals.

The city charter, having empowered the council to fix the number of officers in the police department according to the needs of the department, had the right to reduce the number of corporals, though in so doing it created a vacancy in the office of the corporal, who could be suspended only for good cause shown.

4. Municipal corporations ⟸126—Office created by ordinance may be abolished by ordinance.

Generally an office or position created by municipal ordinance may be abolished by ordinance, in which case the incumbent ceases to be an officer, even though by reason of having been appointed for a definite term, or by special statutory provision, he cannot be lawfully removed except for cause after a full hearing.

5. Municipal corporations ⟸126 — Charter provisions restricting power of removal refer to removals for lapse of duty, and do not restrict council's power to abolish offices.

Provisions of city charters restricting the power of removal of public officers and employees refer to removals for lapse of duty and the like, and are not a restriction upon the power of the council to abolish as many of the places or offices once provided for as it chooses, by abolishing the offices or places themselves, provided such action is taken in good faith.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Everett J. Brown, Judge.

Application by Thomas F. O'Neill for a writ of mandamus against Harry G. Williams, as Auditor of the City of Oakland. Judgment denying the petition and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Ostrander & Carey, of Oakland, for appellant.

H. L. Hagan, City Atty., and T. J. Ledwich and Earl Warren, Deputy City Attys., all of Oakland, for respondent.

WASTE, P. J. The plaintiff sought a writ of mandate to compel the defendant, as auditor of the city of Oakland, to issue his warrant for salary claimed to be due for services as corporal in the police department of that city. The lower court gave judgment for the defendant, and the plaintiff has appealed.

The charter of the city of Oakland provides that the police department of the municipality, other than patrolmen, shall consist of a chief of police, captain of inspectors, and such captains, lieutenants, sergeants, corporals, and bailiffs as in the judgment of the council the needs of the service may require, who shall be appointed by the commissioner of public health and safety, subject to the civil service provisions of the charter. It is not incumbent upon the council, however, either to create or fill all of those positions. Oakland City Charter, art. 14, §§ 87–89. Proceeding under the charter provisions, the Oakland city council from time to time created 14 positions of corporal, one of which was held by the appellant. On May 21, 1919, he was suspended from the department by the commissioner of public health and safety, for alleged cause. His suspension continued until December 9th, following, when, on appeal, it was set aside and annulled by the civil service board.

After appellant was suspended, and before his appeal was sustained, the council passed several ordinances relating to the police department, which became effective on June 30, 1919. The effect of these ordinances (No. 1612 [N. S.], No. 1617 [N. S.], inclusive), which for the most part were merely amendatory of existing ordinances, was to reduce the number of corporals then existing from 14 to 7. The positions thus provided for were thereupon regularly filled by appointment, and the incumbents continued to serve, and were thenceforth regularly paid their salaries, as corporals.

It is now appellant's contention that the effect of the resolution of the civil service commission, reversing the order of his suspension, was to restore him not only to membership in the police department, but also to the rank of corporal, and that he is entitled to the salary attached to that position for the whole time he was prevented from performing his duties.

[1] As to a portion of that period, appellant's contention holds true. It is a well-settled rule that a public officer, or employee wrongfully removed from office is entitled, upon the reversal of his removal, to the salary of the position during the time he was excluded from the performance of his duties by the erroneous order of suspension. Ward v. Marshall, 96 Cal. 155, 159, 30 Pac. 1113, 31 Am. St. Rep. 198. Consequently, appellant was entitled to salary as corporal from May 21, the day on which he was suspended until June 30, the date on which his position as corporal was abolished. As to that portion of the salary there appears to be no question, for it was apparently paid. Appellant was immediately appointed a sergeant of police upon his restoration to the department. Hence this appeal has to do only with appellant's contention that his status as corporal continued even after June 30th, and until the date of his restoration, and that he should be paid the salary attached to that position during all of that period.

[2, 3] The appellant admits that the number of corporals in the police department may, unquestionably, be fixed by the city council as in its judgment the needs of the service may require. He contends: First, that no vacancy was created in the position held by him by the adoption of the ordinance reducing the number of corporals; and, second, that if such was the result, it was in clear violation of the provisions of the city charter relating to removal from office and employment, and deprived him of the right to appeal to the civil service board. Neither contention is sound. In the first place, the charter itself vests in the council the power to fix the number of officers in the police department, as in its judgment the needs of the service may require. It cannot be supposed that the framers of the charter intended that after the police department was once organized, and its members finally appointed, the number so appointed must continue in office, whether the public needs require their retention or not.

[4, 5] It is a general rule, now well settled, that an office or position created by municipal ordinance may be abolished by ordinance, in which case the incumbent ceases to be an officer. Even when an officer, by reason of having been appointed for a definite term, or by special statutory provision, cannot be lawfully removed except for cause after a full hearing, his office may be summarily abolished whenever the municipal authorities deem it advisable. 19 R. C. L. 936, par. 236. It is equally well established by the decisions of the courts of many states that provisions restricting the power of removal, similar to those found in the civil service provision of the Oakland city charter, refer to removals for lapse of duty and the like, and are not a restriction upon the power of the council to abolish as many of the places or offices once provided for as it chooses, by abolishing the offices or places themselves, provided such action be taken in good faith. Fitzsimmons v. O'Neill, 214 Ill. 494, 73 N. E. 797; People ex rel. Corrigan v. Mayor of Brooklyn, 149 N. Y. 215, 43 N. E. 554; Heath v. Salt Lake City, 16 Utah, 374, 52 Pac. 602.

The ordinance reducing the number of corporals from 14 to 7 resulted in abolishing just that number of positions. State ex rel. Quintin v. Edwards, 40 Mont. 287, 304, 106 Pac. 695, 20 Ann. Cas. 239. It was not pleaded, there is nothing in the record to show, nor do we find it asserted in the briefs, that the Oakland city council was acting in bad faith in reducing the number of corporals, or that the passage of the ordinances, which had the effect of abolishing appellant's position, was a pretext, or device to get rid of him, or any other member of the department. It does not appear that the number of corporals was at once, or ever has been, restored to the number existing when appellant was suspended. No one seems to have succeeded to the positions which were abolished. As was said in another case, it would "be difficult, if not inimical to reasonable deduction, to extract from the record, in the face of the presumption of good faith primarily to be accorded to the acts of the" council that the reduction in the number of corporals was made in bad faith. Venable v. Police Commissioner, 40 Or. 458, 466, 67 Pac. 203.

In answer to appellant's contention that to uphold the judgment of the lower court is to leave every officer and member of the police department at the mercy of a designing and evil-intentioned city council, we need only point out that the element of good faith must ever govern such matters. Fraud, deceit and intrigue, if shown, would defeat the object of any pretended praiseworthy action. An apt quotation from the highest court of a sister state appeals to us in this connection:

"There is a real and fundamental distinction between the laudable abolition of an unnecessary position and the discharge of a faithful employee in violation of the rights secured to him by statute, and the latter action can neither be concealed nor protected by a pretense that it was an exercise of the former right." Garvey v. Lowell, 199 Mass. 47, 50, 85 N. E. 182, 127 Am. St. Rep. 468.

If fraud was present in the instant case, it has not been shown.

The fact that one of the seven positions of corporal provided by the ordinance in effect on June 30th was filled by certain appointments pending the return to active duty of a member of the department under temporary disability, did not alter the situation. The fact remains that appellant was not appointed to the position.

The judgment is affirmed.

IBBETSON v. IBBETSON. (Civ. 3836.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. May 19, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 18, 1921.)

1. Appeal and error ⊂⊃931(1)—Presumption that every fact necessary to support judgment was proved and found.

Findings having been waived, it is presumed on appeal that every fact essential to the support of the judgment was proved and found by the trial court, and, where the evidence was conflicting, such presumption governs.

2. Husband and wife ⊂⊃264—Finding that there was no community property to divide held warranted.

Finding that there was no community property to divide between spouses on divorce held warranted under the evidence.

3. Divorce ⊂⊃312—Decree restraining wife from criticizing husband before children will not be disturbed on appeal no abuse of discretion being shown.

Regardless of whether an appeal may be taken from an order involving the custody of children, as Civ. Code, § 138, gives the superior court jurisdiction to modify it, an order in a divorce decree restraining the wife from criticizing the husband before their children or poisoning their minds against him will not be disturbed on appeal, the matter being left to the sound discretion of the trial court, and the record not showing the result of the court's examination of the children in chambers.

4. Divorce ⊂⊃312—Where trial court had children before it, orders as to their custody will not be disturbed.

Where the trial court had the children of the divorced parents before him in chambers, an order as to custody will not be disturbed on appeal; no abuse of discretion being shown.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Chas. S. Crail, Judge.

Action for divorce by Robert Edwin Ibbetson against Maude Rice Ibbetson who filed a cross-complaint. Decree for defendant granting divorce. From the portion of the decree as to division of property and the control of children, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Newlin & Ashburn, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

J. Wiseman Macdonald, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff and respondent commenced an action for divorce charging desertion by his wife, and defendant and appellant answered, denying the allegations of plaintiff's complaint, and filed a cross-complaint for maintenance charging desertion on the part of plaintiff and alleging that the plaintiff had in his possession a large amount of community property, the nature and value of which she was unable to state. In his answer to the cross-complaint plaintiff denied that he had any community property in his possession, and in this behalf alleged that on the 11th day of November, 1911, plaintiff and defendant entered into a contract whereby the parties agreed upon a division of the community property and granted to each other all of their community rights and agreed that the property so segregated and apportioned to each other should be the separate property of that party, and that all rents, issues, and profits derived by each party from such property should be the separate estate of that party; also that all property acquired by either party thereto subsequent to September 1, 1911, should be and forever remain the separate property of such party. It appears that this agreement was made in pursuance of an order of the superior court made in an action brought by this defendant against this plaintiff for a divorce. This order, which was made on the 16th day of May, 1911, directed the entry of a decree of divorce of these parties, awarding to the husband the custody of the two sons of said parties and awarding to the wife the custody of their daughter, and directing the equal division of the community property. The agreement of November 11, 1911, in addition to providing for a division of the community property, required the husband to support and maintain the two sons whose custody he was given by the order of the court and required the wife to support the daughter. It was further agreed that the children of said parties should always be educated in religious schools at the cost and expense of the party having the custody of said children, as theretofore provided.

During the course of the trial plaintiff proceeded upon the theory that this contract was an executed agreement in so far as the property rights of the parties were concerned, that it was entered into upon the solicitation of the defendant to induce the plaintiff to go back and live with her, and that it was not a separation agreement. In accordance with this theory plaintiff contended during the course of the trial and still insists that the property acquired by him after the execution of the agreement was his separate property and that at the time of the trial there was no community property to be divided between the parties. On the other hand, the defendant proceeded upon the theory that the agreement was an executory contract in the nature of a separation agreement, that it had become abrogated by a later reconciliation, and that all property acquired by plaintiff subsequent to the execution of the agreement belonged to the community.

Though the defendant in her cross-complaint prayed for maintenance only, the court awarded her an absolute divorce, giving her the custody of all the children, with a monthly award of maintenance for herself and the children, but made no division or award of any community property. Findings of fact and conclusions of law were waived by the parties in open court. The defendant accepted the decree of divorce and the award of maintenance, but prosecutes this appeal from certain portions of the decree, assigning three grounds of error: (1) Failure of the trial court to make a division of community property; (2) the inclusion in the decree of an order restraining defendant from criticizing plaintiff before their children or poisoning their minds against him; and (3) the inclusion in the decree of an order permitting plaintiff to take his daughter from the mother's home to places within the city of Los Angeles for a period of six hours every alternate Saturday.

[1, 2] Findings having been waived, the presumption is that every fact essential to the support of the judgment was proved and found by the court, and that accordingly the court found that there was no community property. Bruce v. Bruce, 16 Cal. App. 353, 357, 116 Pac. 994; Dee v. Dee, 34 Cal. App. 658, 168 Pac. 588; Gray v. Gray, (Sup.) 197 Pac. 945. On the issue thus joined there is a substantial conflict in the evidence, with the exception that all the evidence, supports the theory of the plaintiff that the property settlement was made in comtemplation of some reconciliation between the parties, and that it was not a separation agreement. It is admitted, as recited in this agreement of November 11, 1911, that the wife had instituted divorce proceedings against her husband, and that an order of court was made that an interlocutory decree of divorce be entered in favor of the wife and making an equal division of community property. It does not appear that this decree was ever entered. However, acting upon the terms of the order, the parties entered into the agreement providing for the division of the community property and the support, maintenance, and education of the children. It is also admitted that deeds of conveyance passed between the parties in accordance with the terms of the agreement, and it further appears that none of its terms remained unexecuted except in so far as they related to the custody, maintenance, support, and education of the children. Each party took the property and dealt with it from that time on as his or her separate property. The rents, issues, and profits thereof were taken and used as the separate property of the respective parties. The home which by the terms of the agreement was assigned to the wife remained in her possession and the husband entered it by invitation only. Immediately after the execution of the agreement the parties traveled together to San Francisco, taking their two sons to a school in Berkeley, and soon thereafter made an extended trip to New York and through the South, traveling together as man and wife.

The testimony relating to the domestic relations of the parties from that time on is conflicting, but, taking it altogether, it is apparent that the trial court could justly conclude therefrom that whatever efforts were made toward a reconciliation had been unsuccessful. There is no dispute, however, that those portions of the agreement relating to the custody and care of the children were not carried out, but that at all times the wife retained the custody and control of the sons as well as of the daughter. A marked conflict in the testimony arises over the support of the children during this period, but at the close of the trial the court expressly ruled that the wife was not entitled to reimbursement for moneys expended in that connection.

The testimony relating to the properties of the respective parties is in direct conflict both as to the value of the properties held by each party and as to the manner in which respondent's property had been increased since the date of the agreement. Testimony was offered to the effect that appellant's property was of equal value to that held by respondent at the time of the execution of the agreement, and that it had increased proportionately to his since that time. It also appeared from the statement of the court made during the course of the trial that this increase in the value of the properties had occurred at a time when the parties were not living together as husband and wife. The evidence is such, therefore, that, if the trial court had expressly found that there was no community property at the time of the trial, such finding would have been supported by the evidence. As findings were waived, this court must presume, in view of the rule heretofore referred to, that the court found that to be a fact proved.

[3] Appellant appeals from that portion of the judgment which restrains her from criticizing respondent before her children or poisoning their minds against him. It is argued that no issue was raised supporting this portion of the decree, that no evidence was offered showing the necessity for such injunctive relief, and that it is entirely unnecessary. Without determining that an order of this nature relating to the care and custody of minor children can be made the subject-matter of an appeal, when under section 138 of the Civil Code the superior court is given jurisdiction to modify or vacate it at any time, it is sufficient to say that such an order, being left to the sound discretion of the trial court, should not be disturbed on appeal merely upon the ground that it does not appear to be necessary. The pleadings involved the care and custody of the children and prayed for such relief as might be equitable, and this was sufficient to raise the issue. At the close of the trial the parties stipulated that the court might interview the children in chambers, and this was done. No record of what occurred during the course of such interview is presented, and this court cannot, therefore, say that the necessity for this portion of the order is not shown by the evidence.

[4] Appellant also appeals from that portion of the decree which permits the respondent to take his daughter from her mother's home on stated occasions. It is argued that because of the physical condition of the daughter it is not practicable to permit her to go from her mother's home in the company of the father, and certain testimony of the mother to this effect is referred to in support of the argument that this portion of the decree was an abuse of the discretion committed to the trial court. What has just been said in relation to the last point raised applies equally to this. The orders of the trial court relating to the care and custody of minor children whose parents are involved in divorce proceedings are directed to the best interest and welfare of the children, and are not to be used for the purpose of satisfying the prejudices of the parents. The court, having had these parties before it and having had the opportunity of interviewing the children in chambers in the absence of their parents, was far better able to determine what was best for the welfare of the children than is this court. There is no evidence in the record to support a holding that the court's discretion in this respect was abused.

For the reasons given, the judgment is affirmed.

RUDIN et al. v. LUMAN. (Civ. 2255.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 15, 1921.)

1. Appeal and error ⊂=994(3), 1011(1)—Findings on conflicting testimony conclusive; inconsistencies in testimony of witness for trial court.

Finding of fact on conflicting testimony will not be disturbed on appeal, though there may be inconsistencies in a witness' testimony, unless they develop a palpably incredible or improbable story.

2. Principal and agent ⊂=146(2)—Undisclosed agent, contracting as principal, liable as such.

An undisclosed agent, contracting as principal, is liable as such.

3. New trial ⊂=89—Testimony reasonably and naturally to be expected in proof or denial of fact relevant to issue not ground of "surprise."

Not alone testimony clearly within the issues presented by the pleadings, but testimony which might reasonably and naturally have been expected in proof or denial of a fact relevant to the issue, as where the issue was whether defendant hired horses of plaintiff, and defendant, claiming the hiring was by T., introduced an order of T. on defendant to pay plaintiff for the hire, and plaintiff denied having seen the order, is not ground of "surprise" within Code Civ. Proc. § 657, subd. 3, as regards new trial; but surprise within the statute must be the result of some fact or circumstance or situation occurring at the trial which could not in the nature of the case reasonably have been anticipated, and is of such importance in its influence on the result arrived at as to have produced injury.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Surprise.]

4. Appeal and error ⊂=981—New trial ⊂=99—Whether granted for newly discovered evidence discretionary.

Whether new trial will be granted for newly discovered evidence is a matter addressed to the discretion of the trial court, with the exercise of which interference is not justified, unless it clearly appears that the discretion has been abused.

5. New trial ⊂=101—Evidence known of before trial not newly discovered.

Evidence, known of by a party at and before the trial, is not newly discovered as regards granting him a new trial, where the witness who could give the testimony was not present at the trial.

6. Appeal and error ⟸1015(5) — Whether there was proper diligence to secure attendance of witness question for trial court.

Whether there was proper diligence to secure attendance of witness, for whose absence new trial is sought, is a question of fact, under all the circumstances, for the trial court; no legal steps to secure his attendance having been taken, but reliance having been placed on his promise to attend.

Appeal from Superior Court, Butte County; H. D. Gregory, Judge.

Action by Jacob Rudin and another against W. E. Luman. Judgment for plaintiffs, new trial denied, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Jerome D. Peters, of Chico, for appellant. J. O. Goldstein, of Chico, for respondents.

HART, J. The plaintiffs brought this action to recover from the defendant the sum of $663.25. The complaint is in two counts, in the first of which it is alleged that the plaintiffs rented and hired to the defendant, between the 8th day of July, 1918, and the 1st day of November, 1918, 14 head of work horses, "at the agreed price and rental of 75 cents per day for each horse; that the said defendant received the said horses on the 8th day of July, 1918, and used and worked them continuously for the period of time" first hereinabove mentioned, and that by reason of the use of said horses so hired to defendant the latter became indebted to the plaintiffs in the sum of $771.75, of which amount the defendant has paid plaintiffs the sum of $140, leaving a balance due and owing to them by defendant in the sum of $631.75. In the second count it is alleged that plaintiffs, between the 8th day of July, 1918, and the 1st day of November, 1918, sold and delivered to defendant a one-half set of harness at the agreed price of $20 and one "Yankee Bridger" at the agreed price of $11.50, making a total of $31.50, which the defendant has refused, and still refuses, to pay. The defendant answered each count of the complaint with specific denials and also set up in bar of the action stated in each count the statute of frauds. Civ. Code, § 1624, subd. 2. Judgment passed for the plaintiffs. Thereafter and in due time the defendant noticed and pressed a motion for a new trial, which motion was denied. Said motion was made upon affidavits and the minutes of the court, the grounds thereof being: Insufficiency of the evidence to justify the decision and judgment; "accident or surprise which ordinary prudence could not have guarded against"; newly discovered evidence material for said defendant, which he could not, with reasonable diligence, have discovered and produced at the trial. This appeal is by the defendant from the judgment.

There are but two points urged for a reversal, viz.: (1) That the evidence does not support the findings; (2) that the court abused its discretion in denying defendant's motion for a new trial. Neither of these points can be sustained.

As to the first point, it is well first to explain that the defendant did not deny at the trial that he carried on and consummated the agreement for the hiring of the horses with the plaintiffs, but claimed that in making the agreement he was acting for one J. W. Taylor, and that he so informed plaintiff Jacob Rudin, between whom and defendant the negotiations culminating in the agreement were had, at the time the negotiations were under way.

It appears that the defendant was, at the time the transaction herein involved took place, a hay and grain broker in the city of Chico, and that he had a contract with the general government to supply it with a certain quantity of baled hay and straw; that among others employed by him to bale hay and straw for that purpose was one J. W. Taylor, who was running or overseeing the work of baling by means of hay presses at what the witnesses designated as the "Nelson" place, in Butte county.

The plaintiff Jacob Rudin testified that, on the 7th day of July, 1918, the defendant called at his ranch and proposed to Rudin to hire or rent a number of the latter's work horses, to be used in the work of gathering and baling hay and straw on the Nelson place. After some discussion of the proposition, Rudin finally agreed to let defendant have 11 head of his horses at the rate of 75 cents per day for each horse. The defendant thereupon employed one Conrad Shepp to take the horses to the Nelson place, and the horses were used from the date of the hiring until about the 29th day of September, 1918. On the 16th day of July, 1918, proceeded Rudin's testimony, the defendant hired from plaintiffs, to be used for the same purpose, three other horses, and used and worked those from the date just mentioned until August 10, 1918. The same price as was agreed to be paid for the use of the horses first obtained was to be paid for the use of the last three hired by defendant. Jacob Rudin testified that the defendant paid him by his (defendant's) check $140 on account, and that after the defendant ceased using the horses and they were returned to him he, on several occasions, demanded of defendant a full settlement of the amount due him, but that defendant, while not denying his indebtedness to plaintiffs for the hire of the horses, would put him off by saying that he was then without sufficient money to extinguish the debt, explaining, however, that the government was indebted to him (defendant) in a large sum, and that when he received payment from the government he would pay what he owed to plaintiffs.

Said plaintiff also testified that he let defendant have the harness and the "Yankee Bridger" or "breeching" mentioned in the second count of the complaint, but that defendant had never paid for those articles. In this connection it should be stated that, while it is not disputed that the defendant obtained from plaintiffs the articles just referred to, it is not clear from the evidence whether said articles were sold to the defendant or merely loaned to him by plaintiffs. The plaintiff Jacob did testify, however, that he made a demand on defendant for the value in money of the harness and breeching or their return, but that defendant stated that he did not know what had become of them, referred Jacob to J. W. Taylor for information as to their whereabouts, and that they (plaintiffs) had never received them back or their value in money, which he stated were the amounts, respectively, alleged in the complaint.

In his cross-examination of Jacob Rudin, counsel for the defendant undertook to induce him to say that, when defendant hired the horses, the latter stated to him (Jacob) that he (defendant) was acting in the transaction for said J. W. Taylor, and that the latter was to compensate plaintiffs for the use of the horses. Counsel further likewise attempted to show by Jacob that he was paid by defendant the $140 on account upon a written order by Taylor on defendant, requesting such payment. In connection with the latter cross-examination, counsel for defendant exhibited to Jacob a writing purporting to be the order referred to.

In response to the cross-questioning above adverted to, Jacob Rudin positively testified that, at the time the agreement was made for the hire of the 11 head of horses, he did not know nor had he ever heard of J. W. Taylor; that defendant did not refer to Taylor when the negotiations were in progress for the hire of the horses, nor did he state to Jacob that he was acting for any other person but himself; that, as to the written order referred to, and which was given to him for inspection by counsel for defendant, he declared that he had never received such a writing from said Taylor or any other person; that he did not present such a paper to defendant at or before the time the latter paid him by check the $140, and that he had never seen the writing until it had been shown him by defendant's attorney during the course of the latter's cross-examination of him.

John Rudin testified that a few days prior to the day on which defendant hired and took possession of the 11 head of horses defendant approached and asked him whether he would hire the horses to him, to be used for the purpose above explained; that he replied that he did not approve of letting his horses out for such use, but referred defendant to his (John's) brother Jacob.

Conrad Shepp testified that he was employed by defendant to take the horses to the Nelson place; that, after getting the horses to said place, he asked defendant for compensation for the services so performed, and stated that he (Shepp) thought $5 would constitute reasonable compensation for his labor; that defendant protested that the demand was exorbitant, and "kicked about it," but finally paid the witness the amount demanded.

[1, 2] The above is, in substance, the evidence presented by the plaintiff. A different story is told by the defendant, and in a measure it is corroborated by the testimony of other witnesses. It is not necessary to present herein a statement of the facts to which the defendant and his witnesses testified. It is enough to say that the adversary showing thus made had the effect only of producing a conflict in the evidence addressed to the vital points of the controversy and as to conflicts in the evidence upon a disputed question of fact, which are substantial, the rule is too well known and understood to require its repetition here. The reviewing courts, as often it has been repeated, are not charged with the duty of weighing testimony, and thus determining conflicts which may exist therein. The law, with singular wisdom, has committed that responsibility to the trial courts; and this is also true as to any inconsistencies which may appear in the testimony of a particular or any witness. Such inconsistencies, if any there be, are, of course, always to be considered by the trial court in its determination of the question of how much credence, if any, should be given the witness whose testimony is thus characterized, and therefore how much weight his testimony is entitled to. If they do not develop a palpably incredible or improbable story, then the acceptance or rejection of the testimony by the trial court is conclusive upon a reviewing court. In this case, the circumstance of the presentation in evidence of the purported written order of the said J. W. Taylor upon defendant, requesting the latter to pay plaintiffs $140, the said payment to be charged by defendant to the account of Taylor, is strongly emphasized by the defendant here as confirmatory of his contention or defense that the horses were hired by him for Taylor, and not for himself. That circumstance, it may be conceded, reveals rather a strange situation in the case, yet Jacob Rudin, as seen, denied that he ever presented such an order to defendant or that he had ever seen the writing introduced in evidence until the trial of this action was in progress. Thus a question was raised as to whether said Rudin had in fact ever been given such an order by Taylor, and it was for the trial court to determine that question upon the conflicting evidence addressed thereto. Moreover, even if it were true that defendant was acting for Taylor in the transaction eventuating in the hiring of the horses, and that such an order was given Jacob Rudin, and that upon it the defendant paid plaintiffs the $140, still, as may be recalled, Jacob Rudin testified that at no time did defendant inform or say to him that he was acting for Taylor in said transaction. If this is true, then the plaintiffs had the right to act in the transaction upon the assumption that they were dealing directly with defendant, and, besides, having thus held himself out as the principal in the deal, the defendant became liable to plaintiffs for the contract and its legal consequences. We are not able to say that the court abused its discretion in denying the defendant's motion for a new trial.

We have already in the above discussion considered the first ground of the motion, to wit: That the evidence is insufficient to justify the decision and judgment of the court. We now have only to consider the second and third grounds of the motion, viz. "accident or surprise which ordinary prudence could not have guarded against," and "newly discovered evidence material for the defendant which he could not, with reasonable diligence, have discovered and produced at the trial." As stated, the defendant presented affidavits in support of the motion; one of said affidavits being by the defendant himself and the other by the J. W. Taylor referred to above.

The defendant in his affidavit stated that said J. W. Taylor was the party who hired said horses, and that about two weeks prior to the time of the trial of this action he called on said Taylor, "who told him that he would be present at said trial, without need of subpœna, and at said trial would testify that he was the one who had hired said horses through the agency of the defendant, and that he had had money demanded of him for said hire by the plaintiffs, and as a result of one of said demands had given to the plaintiff Jacob Rudin an order in writing upon the defendant W. E. Luman, for a certain sum of money, which said order requested said Luman to pay Jacob Rudin the amount stated therein and to charge the same to the account of J. W. Taylor, which said order is now in evidence presented at the trial of the foregoing case; that relying upon the promise of said Taylor to be present and be a witness, the defendant prepared for trial, and only discovered at the time of the trial that the said Taylor would not be there." The defendant further deposed:

"That he was taken by surprise at the trial by the denial of Jacob Rudin that the order above referred to was presented by said Rudin to the defendant and that the latter accepted the same, and consequently the defendant did not produce any witness to the fact of such presentation of such order by said plaintiff except himself, but at the time of the presentation of such order M. L. Warnick was working in his office and the defendant has discovered since said trial that she remembers the presentation of said order by the said plaintiff Jacob Rudin, and of his accepting a check in accordance therewith."

J. W. Taylor stated in his affidavit that he hired the horses mentioned in the complaint from the plaintiffs for the purpose of running his bailing outfit, and that he was responsible for the hire thereof; that if he had been present at the trial of said action he would have so testified; that the defendant came to him two weeks prior to said trial in Chico, Butte county, and asked him if he would be a witness at the time of said trial on June 8, 1920, and that he told said defendant that he would be such a witness and be present at said time; that subsequent thereto and prior to the date of said trial, and in order to avoid being a witness at said trial, the said affiant without acquainting the defendant with the fact, left the county of Butte and went to the town of Willits, in Mendocino County, Cal.; "that the reason he so left was that he would have had to testify that the horse hire sued upon was his hire, and that he did not wish at that time to testify thereto, owing to the fact that the plaintiffs in said action might have sued him therefor." Taylor also deposed that the order referred to above was actually delivered by him to the plaintiff Jacob Rudin on the date in said order specified, and that it was delivered to Rudin for the purpose of presentation to defendant, to the end that said defendant would pay the amount of said order.

[3] It is well settled that it is no ground for granting a new trial because of surprise, where the "surprise" is caused by evidence which is clearly within the issues presented by the pleadings. Santa Cruz Rock Pavement Co. v. Bowie, 104 Cal. 286, 37 Pac. 934; Francisco v. Benepe, 6 Mont. 243, 11 Pac. 637; Wilson v. Waldron, 12 Wash. 149, 40 Pac. 740; Salida Building & Loan Ass'n v. Davis, 16 Colo. App. 294, 64 Pac. 1046; Washington v. Byers, 7 Kan. App. 812, 53 Pac. 150.[1]

A party to an action, after issue has been joined, is always to be presumed to know precisely what he is expected to prove or disprove to prevail. In other words, presumably he knows what the issue to be tried is, and it is to be assumed that he will not, without protest or objection, enter upon the trial of the issue in the absence of such preparation as he may make to meet such issue or any questions of fact relevantly arising, or which may naturally be expected to arise, under the issue or issues as framed by the pleadings. If, as is often true, testimony in proof or denial of some important fact or circumstance relevant to the issue is given against a party, and he finds himself unprepared to make a counter showing relative thereto because he did not anticipate that any such testimony would be given, he cannot, if the decision is against him, justly claim that he is entitled to a new trial on the ground of surprise caused by the testimony so given, or the denial so made, unless such testimony or denial is so far afield from what might reasonably and naturally have been expected to be made in view of the nature of the issues to be tried as to place him unexpectedly at a serious disadvantage or to cause him to suffer injury therefrom without any default or negligence of his own, which ordinary prudence could not have guarded against. McGuire v. Drew, 83 Cal. 225, 23 Pac. 312; Brandt v. Krogh, 14 Cal. App. 39, 60, 111 Pac. 275.

In the instant case, the question whether the defendant hired the horses was the sole issue. The precise defense which defendant expected to develop by his proofs was not disclosed by his answer; he merely denying the allegation of the complaint that he hired the horses. He, of course, when he filed his answer, well knew the theory or the facts upon which he expected and intended to rely to defeat the plaintiffs' claim, and knowing all this, as well as the claim set up against him by the plaintiffs in their complaint, he must necessarily have expected that the latter would attempt by proof to negative the effect of any important fact or circumstance which he might undertake to establish in support of the denials of his answer. Of course, he might have been surprised on hearing the denial by Jacob Rudin that he was given by Taylor the order on him (defendant) for money on account of the hire of the horses, or that he (said Rudin) ever saw said order until the trial; but the surprise thus brought to him is not the "surprise" which the statute (Code Civ. Proc. § 657, subd. 3) contemplates shall constitute a ground for the granting of a motion for a new trial. The "surprise" mentioned by the statute must be the result of some fact or circumstance or situation occurring at the trial which could not in the nature of the case reasonably have been anticipated would arise and which is of such importance or magnitude in its influence upon the result arrived at from the trial as to have produced as against him or his rights injury or damage. The mere giving of testimony contrary to the interests of a party, or even the fact that false testimony has thus been given, although wholly unexpected by the party against whom it is given, will not itself always operate as a predicate for the awarding of a new trial of the issue. Of course, if a vanquished party has been misled by a witness as to the nature of the testimony he intends to give, or if perjured testimony has unexpectedly been given, and it may justly be said that in either case such testimony has influenced the decision in any manner or degree, it might be proper to grant a new trial upon a satisfactory showing by such party either that, relying upon the statement of the witness as to what he would testify to, he made no preparation to have at the trial testimony, available to him, which would have tended to overcome the effect of the testimony of such witness, or that the testimony was false or prejured. No such showing was made in this case.

[4-6] As to the other ground of the motion, to wit, "newly discovered evidence," etc., it is also to be remarked that the granting or refusing to grant a new trial on that ground is a matter which is addressed to the discretion of the trial court, with the exercise of which discretion interference is not justified unless it is clearly made to appear that it has been abused. This rule is so thoroughly settled in this state that it has become elementary in our practice, and the citation of authorities to confirm this statement is not necessary. But the "newly discovered" evidence to which the affidavits presented by defendant refer is, as a matter of fact, not newly discovered. Of the existence of that evidence before and at the time of the trial the defendant was, of course, fully aware; and that Taylor's testimony would be of singular importance as tending to establish his defense he also knew, for not only in his affidavit does he depose but at the trial he testified that, some 10 days or two weeks prior to the date fixed for the trial, he verbally informed Taylor of the date set for the trial, and likewise requested him to be present and testify in his (defendant's) behalf. Further than that, defendant made no effort to secure the attendance of Taylor at the trial. He did not have a subpœna issued for him or take any legal steps to secure Taylor's presence at the trial. Moreover, when the case was called for trial his counsel announced that defendant was ready to proceed; no objection to going on with the trial upon the ground of the absence of Taylor having been made by him. It was for the trial court to say, from all the circumstances disclosed, whether the defendant had exercised proper or reasonable diligence in attempting to procure the attendance of Taylor at the trial. As above stated, we are not prepared to hold that the trial court was wrong in deciding that such diligence was not shown, or that, upon the whole record, the court abused its discretion in denying the motion for a new trial upon the ground here considered.

The judgment is affirmed.

SMITH v. ASSOCIATED OIL CO.
(Civ. 3729.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. June 10, 1921.)

1. Negligence ⟸108(1)—General allegation sufficient.

A complaint charging in general terms that the act complained of was done negligently, and caused the injury, is sufficient.

2. Explosives ⟸10—Property owner held contributorily negligent in lighting match near spilled distillate.

A property owner, who knew that distillate was a volatile and inflammable substance, and that defendant's employee had spilled some upon plaintiff's premises in filling a drum, was contributorily negligent as a matter of law in lighting a match within 6 feet of the drum and throwing the match on the ground.

3. Negligence ⟸136(8)—Contributory negligence question of law on undisputed facts.

Contributory negligence is a question of law for the court, where the facts are undisputed and the dictates of common prudence point to only one reasonable conclusion therefrom.

Appeal from Superior Court, Fresno County, H. Z. Austin, Judge.

Action by E. Porter Smith against the Associated Oil Company to recover damages for the destruction of property by fire. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

Johnston & Jones, of Fresno, and Edmund Tauszky, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Henry Hawson and M. K. Harris, both of Fresno, for respondent.

WASTE, P. J. The plaintiff brought this action to recover for damages suffered by reason of the burning of his dwelling and other buildings, the cause of the fire being attributed to the negligence of an employee of the appellant in spilling a quantity of distillate upon the ground while engaged in filling a 50-gallon drum placed close to plaintiff's house. The defendant denied any liability in the matter, and as a separate defense alleged that the destruction of the property was caused by plaintiff's carelessness and negligence in lighting a match in proximity to the inflammable substance, and that plaintiff alone was at fault in causing the fire. Trial was had by a jury. At the conclusion of plaintiff's case defendant moved for a nonsuit, which was denied. The jury rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff in the sum of $2,283. The appellant moved for a new trial on the ground that the evidence was insufficient to support the verdict, and that it was against law, and that the court had made errors in the conduct of the trial which were excepted to by the appellant. The motion was denied, and defendant appeals from the judgment.

[1] Appellant's first contention is that the complaint does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action. The negligence was charged in general terms, it being alleged that the filling of the distillate drum by appellant's employee was done negligently by him, and caused and contributed to the injury to plaintiff's property. The demurrer to the complaint was therefore properly overruled. Hughes v. Warman Steel Co., 174 Cal. 556, 559, 163 Pac. 885.

The testimony as to what occurred in connection with the fire which destroyed respondent's buildings is clear, and presents no material conflicts. The appellant regularly supplied customers in the vicinity of Fresno with gasoline and distillate. The respondent, a general contractor and builder, was at the time engaged in farming. He had had 15 years' experience in the use of gasoline engines and with automobiles. He was familiar with the engine distillate and knew that it was volatile, explosive, and highly inflammable. He had three engines on his place, in one of which he was using distillate on the day of the fire. It was supplied from a tank partly buried about 10 feet from the engine. A reserve supply of distillate was kept in a drum, placed on a rack about 2 feet high, situated in a passageway about 10 feet wide, between the dwelling house and the tank house. This space was roofed over, but open at the ends. The distillate for the engine running low, the respondent drew out all there was in the reserve drum, and replenished the engine tank. Just then the appellant's supply wagon came along, driven by its employee, Thomas. The respondent told Thomas that he had just emptied the reserve drum, and requested him to put 35 gallons of distillate in the tank which was feeding the engine and to put 50 gallons into the reserve drum—"to fill them up." There was some conversation between the two men as to the exact number of gallons the drum would hold, but the fact remains that respondent directed appellant's employee to fill both tanks. Thomas proceeded to fill the tanks, carrying the distillate from the supply wagon in 5-gallon buckets, and pouring the contents into the tanks by means of a large funnel. As he was filling the reserve drum in the passageway the fire occurred. Just how and why it occurred is best told by the most interested witness, the respondent himself. He testified:

"He (Thomas) filled up—put the 35 gallons in the other tank, and then was filling this one, and as he came on with his last gasoline. I didn't know, of course, what had been put in—taking in the last cans anyway— We walked in together, and I had my pipe in my mouth all the time, and I was just fixing to light it as we walked in with the cans of gasoline, the last he put in the drum, and as he walked in— this drum that he was filling was sitting at the corner of my house, and I walked over deliberately to the tank house where I struck the match. I struck the match against the tank house, to light my pipe—had got there on the side of the tank house, and was holding the match at my pipe like this (indicating), and Mr. Thomas said he had got too much. He said, 'Gee, I have got more now in that than it will hold,' and I turned— I was standing more or less with my back toward him, and as I turned there was a flash of flame. I saw the gas running over and I threw the match away, and a flame came—came all at once. * * * The drum that was being filled was in the sun. A kind of a slow breeze was blowing directly from the tank toward me—where I was standing. The distillate had run on the ground quite a bit. * * * It was streaming down on to the ground. * * * There was a flash, and then there was quite a number of places caught fire on the ground between me and the tank."

We think little more need be said in reversing the judgment in this case. The respondent was able to get by the demurrer to his complaint, because he alleged that the distillate gas was ignited by contact with the flame of a match, lighted by him without knowledge, and in ignorance of the fact that that any distillate had been spilled, or was overflowing on the ground. He has proved himself out of court. When he threw the lighted match away, he knew the distillate was overflowing the tank and streaming over the ground. He said on the stand that he was from 12 to 15 feet away. In his complaint he placed the distance at 10 feet. Thomas testified he was but 6 or 8 feet away. The respondent made no investigation when he went into the passageway to ascertain whether any distillate had been spilled in the process of filling the drum. Yet he testified that he knew it would be dangerous to light his pipe if any had overflowed. Aside from the common knowledge of the dangers attendant upon lighting matches near such highly inflammable and volatile substances as distillate, the respondent had the more intimate knowledge and experience already alluded to.

[2] Under all the circumstances of the case we conclude that the respondent, in lighting his pipe and in throwing the lighted match away, after he was aware that distillate was flowing on the ground, did not act in the exercise of that due care required of a man of ordinary experience and sagacity. It was not to be anticipated that such an act would follow the spilling of the distillate. The proximate cause of the loss of the respondent's property was his own negligent act, and he cannot recover for the resulting damage.

[3] When evidence is conflicting, the question of the contributory negligence of a plaintiff is one for the jury to determine under proper instructions from the court. But where, as here, the facts are undisputed, and the dictates of common prudence point to only one reasonable conclusion, the question is then one of law for the court. Catlin v. Union Oil Co., 31 Cal. App. 597, 609, 161 Pac. 29; Glascock v. Central Pacific R. R. Co., 73 Cal. 137, 141, 14 Pac. 518.

The motion for a nonsuit was erroneously denied. The motion for a new trial should have been granted.

The judgment is reversed.

KORKMAN v. HANLON DRY DOCK & SHIPBUILDING CO. (Civ. 3533.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. June 10, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 8, 1921.)

1. False imprisonment ⟸15(3)—Arrest by corporate officer held within scope of employment.

The president and general manager of a shipbuilding corporation who was charged with the duty of keeping the work going, and whose decisions in that respect were final, acted within the scope of his employment in causing the arrest of a carpenter who had reported to his union that machinists were doing carpenters' work on the ships, where the arrest was made for the purpose of preventing the carpenters from being called off the work.

2. False imprisonment ⟸15(3)—Corporation liable for arrest by officer to prevent interference with business.

A corporation is liable for a false imprisonment caused by its president, acting within the scope of his authority, for the purpose of preventing interference with the corporation's business, though it would not be liable for such imprisonment caused for the purpose of punishing an offense committed against the corporation's property.

3. Appeal and error ⟸994(2)—Explanation of cause of arrest disbelieved by jury need not be considered.

On appeal from a judgment for plaintiff, in an action for false imprisonment, the court need not consider the explanation for the arrest given by defendant's president, which was evidently not believed by jury.

4. False imprisonment ⟸39—Whether president acted as corporate agent, and not as deputy sheriff, in making arrest held question for jury.

In an action against corporation for false imprisonment where the evidence showed plaintiff was arrested by defendant's president, who also held a commission as deputy sheriff, but there was evidence that the president ordered the arrest to prevent interference with the progress of shipbuilding, it was a question for the jury to decide whether the president was acting as peace officer or as defendant's agent, and it was wholly immaterial how much of defendant's capital stock the president owned, and what his intention was in making the arrest.

5. False imprisonment ⊜40—Refusal to give instructions as to intention to act as deputy sheriff held not error.

In an action for false imprisonment, where it appeared that defendant's president who caused the imprisonment was also a deputy sheriff, it was not error to modify a requested instruction that if the president intended to act as deputy sheriff the corporation was not responsible for his act by substituting the word "acted" for the words "intended to act," since a finding as to his legal intention is included in a finding as to his act.

6. False imprisonment ⊜22—Facts held not to raise presumption that defendant's president acted as deputy sheriff in making arrest.

Though there is a presumption that a peace officer, whose principal occupation was such, acted as an officer in making an arrest at the direction of a corporation, and even if he was at the time a special agent of the corporation, there is no such presumption where the arrest was made by the president of corporation to prevent interference with its business, though the president was also a deputy sheriff, who, however, had made no arrests theretofor during the five years he had held his commission.

7. False imprisonment ⊜40—Instruction on duty after arrest held correct under evidence.

In an action for false imprisonment an instruction as to the duty of one making an arrest to take the person arrested immediately before a magistrate, as required by Pen. Code, § 849, was properly given where it appeared plaintiff was confined for 25 hours without a hearing as a direct result of his arrest, though that section would not have applied if the confinement had been the result of an independent investigation by the police officers subsequent to the arrest.

Appeal from Superior Court, Alameda County; Everett J. Brown, Judge.

Action by E. F. Korkman against the Hanlon Dry Dock & Shipbuilding Company to recover damages for false imprisonment. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Fitzgerald, Abbott & Beardsley, of Oakland, for appellant.

W. F. Sullivan and W. G. Holmes, both of San Francisco, and Stetson & Thompson, of Oakland, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This is an appeal by the defendant from a judgment against it for $1,500 for arrest and false imprisonment of the plaintiff. The plaintiff alleged that on May 8, 1918, the defendant, by and through its agent and servant D. J. Hanlon, its president, at the place of business of the defendant corporation, caused the plaintiff to be arrested without warrant; that at the instigation and request of defendant, through its said agent, plaintiff was taken to the city prison of Oakland and there imprisoned without warrant, and without any charge being made against him; that he was restrained of his liberty for 25 hours, and was then released without any charge being made against him, and without any hearing before any court or magistrate. Plaintiff then alleged that said arrest and imprisonment were malicious and without probable cause.

Defendant denied the allegations of the complaint, and as a separate defense set up that D. J. Hanlon, the president of the defendant corporation, was at all the times mentioned a duly appointed and acting deputy sheriff of the county of Alameda, and that said D. J. Hanlon made the arrest of plaintiff, as such peace officer, for reasonable and probable cause, and immediately turned the plaintiff over to the police officials of the city of Oakland, and to the Department of Justice of the United States; that said D. J. Hanlon had no authority at any time from the defendant to make or cause the arrest of the plaintiff, or any other person; that it was not within the scope of the employment or authority of said D. J. Hanlon, as president and manager of said defendant company, to cause the arrest of plaintiff.

The cause was tried before a jury, which found for the plaintiff, and assessed his damages at $1,500.

The first objection made by the appellant is that the record does not disclose facts showing Mr. Hanlon's authority to represent the corporation in arresting plaintiff. There was no evidence of any express authority, and the trial court so instructed the jury. Nor was there any claim that there had been a ratification of his act. The case was submitted to the jury upon the theory that it was justified in finding that Mr. Hanlon was impliedly authorized as the agent of the corporation to make the arrest and to cause the imprisonment.

Our first inquiry is as to whether the action of Mr. Hanlon in causing the arrest of plaintiff was committed in the scope of his employment, and as a part of the transaction of the business of the principal. Johnson v. Monson (Sup.) 190 Pac. 635. This makes necessary a somewhat detailed discussion of the facts. Mr. Hanlon was the president of the defendant company; he owned 88 per cent. of its stock. He testified that he was always at the shipyards to "meet" trouble there; that he was the "boss" at all times; that his decision was final upon questions "put up" to him; that he saw what was necessary to be done for the welfare of the business and ordered it done, and saw that his orders were carried out. The plaintiff was a carpenter working on the Santa Flavia, a boat being constructed by the defendant corporation. He was an officer of his trade union, and as such entered into some controversy with the foreman of the machinists working on the ship as to whether the work of boring holes for davits was properly the work of carpenters or machinists. The plaintiff insisted that the work should fall to the lot of the carpenters; the foreman of the machinists insisted upon having the machinists do this work. The evidence is conflicting as to what was said in this argument. There is testimony that plaintiff said he would report to his union, and that he would have all the carpenters called from the work by the union.

This trouble was reported to Mr. Hanlon by the superintendent. Mr. Hanlon, who was a director of the company, and Mr. Foard, another director, went down to the ship. Mr. Hanlon made inquiries as to the name of the carpenter causing the trouble. He testified that he knew that if this man reported to his union that machinists were doing carpenter's work that the union would call off all the carpenters, as it was a rule of the union that no one other than a carpenter was to be permitted to do ship carpenter's work. When asked why the superintendent was not asked to look after this trouble, Mr. Hanlon testified that he had been called upon because it was known that he might have a little more authority than the superintendent in case of a row; that he was a "little better equipped" for trouble. He further testified that if there was going to be any trouble at any time at the yards he always wanted to know if he was "going to be allowed in it, or not."

Mr. Hanlon carried out his purpose in the following manner, according to the testimony of the plaintiff:

"On the 8th day of May, in the afternoon there was a gentleman from the yard come on board of the ship at 4:10 in the afternoon and he told me I was wanted on the telephone in Mr. Hanlon's office. There was a telephone, he said, for me. So I got off the ship and was going up to the office and I met a deputy sheriff. I don't know his name. He wore a deputy sheriff's badge. I met him about halfways on the road to the office. When he met me he said: 'Come along with me,' and I thought I was going for the telephone message, and I followed him up. I thought he was going to direct me to the office, which he did, and when I came up there he brought me into Mr. D. J. Hanlon's office where I saw Mr. Hanlon. Mr. Hanlon asked me what business I had to interfere with certain machinists doing certain kind of work on board the ship, and I answered Mr. Hanlon that I did not interfere with them, with these certain machinists doing that kind of work. Mr. Hanlon said 'Well, you have brought it up to the union headquarters, or informed your business agent that they were doing it,' and I said 'Yes, I have.' And so Mr. Hanlon said, 'I am going to send you where you belong, and all such like as you,' and Mr. Hanlon hollered, 'Get the wagon; get the wagon,' and he told the deputy sheriff, 'Take him back to the ship and get him his coat and hat;' and the deputy sheriff took me back to the ship, and I got my coat, and he took me back to the office, and when I got back the Oakland city police patrol wagon was outside of Mr. Hanlon's office, and this deputy sheriff."

On the witness stand, Mr. Hanlon was asked if he thought that arresting the plaintiff was necessary to hasten getting out the Santa Flavia. To this question, he replied:

"I do because when we got him out of there we didn't have any trouble. We could get the work to go ahead, and if he was left there the work would stop."

[1] From these facts it appears clear that Mr. Hanlon was acting within the scope of his employment, and in pursuance of the object for which he was at the shipyards, which he stated was to give directions about anything necessary for the welfare of the business, and see that his orders were carried out. The fact that he committed a tort —that he did something which his principal could not legally—do does not change the rule under modern decisions. Johnson v. Monson, supra.

[2] Appellant cites numerous cases holding that an agent can have no implied authority to institute criminal proceedings for a corporation, as the institution and prosecution of criminal proceedings are not in aid of the transaction of the corporate business. We have carefully read all of the cases cited, but find that there is a clear difference between such cases and the present one. That difference is the one emphasized in the case of Allen v. London, etc., L. R. 6 Q. B. 65, which is the leading case on the subject, and which is cited in practically all of the cases relied upon by appellant here. The distinction is that where one, to prevent or terminate a present interference with the business or property of his principal, takes a certain step, such as ordering the arrest of a person, that is in furtherance of his duty as manager of the business, or custodian of the property; but where one causes the arrest of another for an offense that has already been committed, such arrest cannot aid in the business of the principal nor serve to protect the principal's property. When the offense has been already committed, punishment therefor is entirely disassociated from the conduct of the principal's business. In the case of Allen v. London, etc., supra, it said:

"There is a marked distinction between an act done for the purpose of protecting the property by preventing a felony or of recovering it back, and an act done for the purpose of punishing the offender for that which has already been done."

In the present case the conduct of the plaintiff, to which Mr. Hanlon objected, was continuing, and it was in an effort to stop this that the arrest was made. If the plaintiff had caused his union to call a strike in the shipyards, and had thus stopped the work upon the ships, and, thereafter, Mr. Hanlon had sought him out and had him arrested, such arrest would clearly not have been in furtherance of the work of the company nor within the scope of Mr. Hanlon's employment, but would have been merely an act to avenge a supposed wrong. Daniel v. Atlantic Coast R. Co., 136 N. C. 517, 48 S. E. 817, 67 L. R. A. 455, 1 Ann. Cas. 718. This would not have been an object within the scope of the duties of any agent of the corporation.

The distinction above pointed out is clearly stated also in the last-cited case, which is one of those relied upon by the appellant. It is there said:

"A servant entrusted with his master's goods may do what is necessary to preserve and protect them, because his authority to do so is clearly implied by the nature of the service; but when the property has been taken from his custody or stolen, and the crime has already been committed, it cannot be said that a criminal prosecution is necessary for its preservation or protection. This may lead to the punishment of the thief or the trespasser, but it certainly will not restore the property, or tend in any degree to preserve or protect it."

In the present case, the injury to the business of the corporation had not yet occurred. The arrest of the plaintiff was a preventive measure. It was in aid of the effective conduct of the business. There was no prosecution of any kind; there was no charge made against the plaintiff. Defendant's activity through its agent was only to the extent of removing the plaintiff from a situation where he could do harm to its business. See B. C. & A. Ry. Co. v. Ennalls, 108 Md. 75, 69 Atl. 638, 16 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1100, at page 1102.

[3] It is unnecessary to discuss Mr. Hanlon's explanation of his purpose in arresting the plaintiff. This testimony was before the jury, which was instructed that, if it believed that Mr. Hanlon had reasonable cause for believing the plaintiff to have violated the terms of the Espionage Act (U. S. Comp. St. 1918, U. S. Comp. St. Ann. Supp. 1919 §§ 10212a–10212h), that Mr. Hanlon was authorized as a deputy sheriff to make such arrest, and such arrest would not be wrongful, and could not be made the basis of an action for damages. The jury, however, did not take this view, from the evidence before it, and so we are unconcerned with testimony regarding this phase of the defense.

[4] The appellant contends that the wrong, if any, was the act of Mr. Hanlon as a deputy sheriff, and not as the agent of the defendant. It was admitted that Mr. Hanlon was an agent, but there was a dispute as to the scope of his agency. It appears from Mr. Hanlon's testimony that Olson, foreman at the defendant's plant, reported plaintiff's conduct to Mr. Hanlon; also, that Upjohn, superintendent of the machinist department, reported to him and asked him "if I could not go down and straighten the thing out the best I could, so he could go ahead with the work." In response, Mr. Hanlon went to the place where Korkman was working. Later the arrest was made. If Mr. Hanlon's act had not been "in the transaction of the business of the agency" the defendant would not have been liable. Civ. Code, § 2338. However, it is patent from the foregoing testimony that Mr. Hanlon under his agency had authority to go to the ship, and that he did go there, to stop the trouble. The arrest followed. The doctrine of respondeat superior applies. Boswell v. Laird, 8 Cal. 469, 489, 68 Am. Dec. 345. Cases similar in principle are Rice v. Harrington, 38 R. I. 47, 94 Atl. 736; Kusnir v. Pressed Steel Car Co. (D. C.) 201 Fed. 146; Rucker v. Barker (Tex. Civ. App.) 151 S. W. 871. Conceding that the interests of all Americans were involved, nevertheless, under the foregoing facts, the interests and business of the defendant were specially involved. Under these facts, it was a question for the jury to decide whether the person making the arrest was acting as a peace officer or as defendant's agent. This proposition is flatly decided in a long line of cases. Kusnir v. Pressed Steel Car Co., supra, 201 Fed. at page 151; Hobbs v. Ill. Cent. R. Co., 182 Iowa, 316, 165 N. W. 912, 917; Hirst v. Fitchburg & L. Street R. Co., 196 Mass. 353, 82 N. E. 10. This being so, it follows that it was wholly immaterial how much of defendant's stock was owned by Mr. Hanlon, and it also follows that neither the intention of the defendant nor the intention of Mr. Hanlon was an issue.

[5] In this connection, appellant objects to the refusal of the trial court to give an instruction stating that, if Mr. Hanlon intended to act in his capacity as deputy sheriff, then the corporation is not responsible for his act. The trial court changed this instruction by inserting the word "acted" for "intended to act." A finding as to his legal intention to act in a certain manner is included in a finding that he did actually act in that manner. The jury has found, under proper instructions, that Mr. Hanlon acted for the corporation. His testimony that he did not intend to so act, together with his positive testimony that he acted under a belief that the plaintiff had violated the provisions of the Espionage Act, was outweighed with the jury, evidently, by the force of the other facts before it. We find no error in the refusal of the court to give this instruction.

[6] Appellant also complains of the refusal of the trial court to give an instruction that:

"When an arrest is made by a peace officer, the presumption is that he acted in his official capacity, and not in behalf of any one by whom he is employed."

Reliance is placed upon the case of Jardine v. Cornell, 50 N. J. Law, 485, 14 Atl. 590, the particular language which appellant contends is applicable here being:

"Upon an undisputed statement of the facts the question presented is for the court. Where a police officer takes a disorderly person from the scene of his disorder to the police station, it will be presumed to have been done in his official character, unless such presumption is repugnant to some rule of law, or is rebutted by the facts of the case."

We think the situation in the present case is decidedly different from the situation in the New Jersey case. Mr. Hanlon is not a police officer. He was, it is true, a duly appointed deputy sheriff for the county of Alameda, and, although he had been such since 1913, he testified that this was the first arrest he had ever made. His business was that of president of the defendant corporation, and as such he looked after the welfare of its business giving his personal attention to the details of its management. In the New Jersey case, relied upon by appellant, the officer making the arrest was a police officer whose sole business was that of enforcing the peace. He had no general duties with reference to the conduct of the business of the defendant corporation. He was called in by a conductor upon the cars of the railroad company to aid in ejecting a passenger and for the purpose of arresting such passenger. The court said:

"The act of the police in removing the plaintiff from the train to the station house was a continuous one. It was their duty as officers of the law to do so, and it was not within the scope of their employment in enforcing the regulations of the railroad company."

In cases where the agent is not employed in the general conduct of his principal's business, but only for some single special purpose, the liability of the principal will be strictly confined. 11 R. C. L. § 23. And even in such a case it is said that the presumption that the agent acted in his capacity as a police officer only exists where not rebutted by the facts of the case. Jardine v. Cornell, supra. The facts of the present case, we think, are such as to indicate that Mr. Hanlon's action was taken in aid of the successful conduct of the defendant's business, in which he owned a large majority of the stock. At least, there is sufficient evidence of that fact to overcome any presumption which might have existed without such evidence.

[7] Objection is made to the instruction given by the trial court as follows:

"The duty of one making an arrest without a warrant to bring the person before a proper magistrate or prosecuting officer that proceedings for the trial of the person may be instituted, and that he may have an opportunity to give bail or otherwise procure his release, is imperative, and if the prisoner is released without being brought before such magistrate, the officer or private person who made the arrest becomes a trespasser from the beginning."

This instruction is almost identical with the statement of the law appearing in 11 R. C. L. § 16, and is sustained by the following citations of authority: Brock v. Stimson, 108 Mass. 520, 11 Am. Rep. 390; Kroeger v. Passmore, 36 Mont. 504, 93 Pac. 805, 14 L. R. A. (N. S.) 988; Leger v. Warren, 62 Ohio St. 500, 57 N. E. 506, 51 L. R. A. 193, and note pp. 216 and 217, 78 Am. St. Rep. 738. It is also the statutory rule in this state. Section 849, Pen. Code. See, also, Harness v. Steele, 159 Ind. 286, 64 N. E. 875.

The cases cited by appellant, Gisske v. Sanders, 9 Cal. App. 13, 98 Pac. 43, and Kalish v. White, 36 Cal. App. 604, 173 Pac. 494, are not applicable in the present case. In the case of Gisske v. Sanders, supra, the court held that the arrest of the plaintiff was justified; also that plaintiff consented thereto, and voluntarily accompanied the arresting officer to the station, where the sergeant made an independent investigation, and his incarceration was at the instance of the sergeant. It is said in that case:

"The rule as to the responsibility of the arresting officer is otherwise where he has authority to and does direct the confinement of the prisoner, or where confinement is the direct result of the arrest."

In the present case it appears that, as a direct result of the arrest of the plaintiff by Mr. Hanlon, he was taken to the station and held in confinement without any examination, and that the next day, after examination by the police officers, he was released because there appeared to be no sufficient cause to hold him.

In the case of Kalish v. White, supra, the arrest was made upon the authority of a warrant, and section 849, Penal Code, has no application to such a case. However, the trial court in the present case met the situation presented by the cases of Gisske v. Sanders and Kalish v. White, supra, by another instruction stating the rule of those cases in the event the jury found facts justifying the arrest of the plaintiff, which would make the rule of those cases applicable. These instructions might have been more clearly differentiated, perhaps, but we do not think the possibility that the jury might have been confused thereby sufficiently great to warrant a reversal of this judgment. The court premised the one upon a finding that the arrest was justifiable, and the other upon a finding that the arrest was without a warrant.

We find no prejudicial error in the record, and the judgment is affirmed.

We concur: NOURSE, J.; STURTEVANT, J.

VAN CAMP v. VAN CAMP. (Civ. 3603, 3604.)

1. Divorce ⊂=184(10)—Trial court's determination on conflicting evidence conclusive.

In considering the question of whether the evidence is sufficient to sustain the findings of the court as to the facts upon which the divorce decree is based, the appellate court will not weigh the testimony and determine as to where the preponderance lies, where the evidence is conflicting, the determination of the trial court in such case being conclusive.

2. Divorce ⊂=184(10)—Evidence viewed from standpoint giving it strongest weight in sustaining findings.

The evidence on appeal must be viewed from the standpoint that will give to it the strongest weight in sustaining the findings of the court.

3. Divorce ⊂=27(1) — Husband's conduct toward corespondent may constitute cruelty.

A husband's acts toward a corespondent may cause a wife sufficient mental torture to constitute extreme cruelty on his part.

4. Divorce ⊂=27(5)—Conduct of husband or wife causing other mental torture may be extreme cruelty, depending on degree of refinement or affection of offended party.

Acts and conduct of either spouse unjustifiable under a reasonable rule of marital behavior, which in any case may cause great physical suffering or mental torture, are sufficient to sustain a charge of extreme cruelty, although conduct which might amount to cruelty in case of a refined or loving wife would not be cruelty in case she were not such.

5. Husband and wife ⊂=262(1)—Property in possession of either husband or wife deemed community estate.

All property in the possession of either husband or wife, is deemed to be community estate of the parties, notwithstanding Civ. Code, § 163, making husband's property owned before marriage, with rents, issues, and profits thereof, his separate property, but such presumption is disputable, and may be overcome by evidence to the contrary.

6. Husband and wife ⊂=257—Income from husband's separate property not community property.

Where the husband at the time of his marriage was a man of large means, which included cash, notes, real estate, and corporate stock, and where during his married life he devoted his attention exclusively to the management of a corporation for which he received a very substantial salary, and an additional sum to meet his expenses incurred in connection with the business, the husband's income during his married life outside of salary and expense money, so received, was not community property, but constituted the rents, issues, and profits of the husband's separate property, owned at the time of his marriage, though some of the income so received was from stock in such corporation, and was the result of his successful management thereof.

7. Husband and wife ⊂=268(4) — Community earnings of husband and wife chargeable with family support.

In the absence of any evidence showing a different practice, the community earnings of husband and wife are chargeable with the family support, and any amount expended for such purpose by either spouse during the existence of the marital relation is presumed to have been paid out of the community estate.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles S. Crail, Judge.

Action by Euphrasia Van Camp against Frank Van Camp. From decree awarding plaintiff a divorce, and from that portion of the judgment awarding to her a specified sum, the defendant appeals, and from the judgment in so far as it fixes the value of community property, the plaintiff appeals. Divorce decree affirmed, and judgment as to amount and value of community property and as to disposition thereof reversed, and cause remanded for new trial.

Kemp & Clewett, of Los Angeles, for Frank Van Camp.

Fredericks & Hanna, of Los Angeles, for Euphrasia Van Camp.

PER CURIAM. This is an action for divorce. Defendant Van Camp has appealed from a decree dissolving the marital bonds, and also from that portion of the judgment awarding to the plaintiff the sum of $60,000, and determining that certain real and personal property is the separate property of the wife. The judgment in favor of the wife for $60,000 was made upon the finding of the court that the community property was of the value of $90,000, and that the plaintiff was entitled to two-thirds thereof. There is a separate appeal taken by the wife from the judgment in so far as it fixes the value of the community estate, it being the contention of the plaintiff that the latter was of a value greatly in excess of $90,000. As the defendant's appeal involves contentions opposite to that of the plaintiff respecting the property judgment, we will consider the appeals together when that feature of the decree is given attention.

In her complaint the plaintiff first charged (on her information and belief) that the husband had committed adultery with a person who was named as corespondent, on two specific occasions, and at other times the dates of which were not stated. A course of improper conduct as occurring between the defendant and the corespondent was described in a separate cause of action and made the ground for a charge of extreme cruelty. As a part of this alleged cause of action it was also set forth that upon one occasion defendant had struck the plaintiff and called her "a damn fool." By reason of the acts and conduct of the defendant, as so described in the second alleged cause of action, plaintiff asserted that she had been caused "great and grievous mental suffering and anguish," and had been caused to "brood and worry to the point of distraction," and "that such mental suffering, anguish, brooding, and worry have seriously impaired the plaintiff's health and vitality." The court in its findings determined that the acts of adultery had not been committed, but added to the findings touching these matters that "the plaintiff had probable and reasonable cause to believe" that defendant did commit the acts charged. It is urged that the findings are not sustained by the evidence, either upon the divorce issues or as to the value of property belonging to the marital community. These contentions will be considered in the order named.

In the year 1914 defendant Van Camp came from Indianapolis to Los Angeles. His family then consisted of a grown son. He was a man of large affairs, and had been the directing head of an extensive packing establishment in Indianapolis bearing his name. He brought to California property of great value, consisting largely of cash and stock securities. After his arrival in Los Angeles he organized the Van Camp Sea Food Co. The company was capitalized with 2,000 shares of stock at a par value of $100 each. He became the president and general manager of the corporation, and received up to January, 1918, a salary of $1,000 per month. This salary was increased on January 1, 1918, to $1,500 per month, and so remained at all times subsequent thereto. The packing plant was located at the seaport town of San Pedro. More particular consideration will be given to the details of defendant's capital, his investments, earnings, and income when we later take up the points raised as against the finding of the court as to the value of the community holdings. We will here pass that subject with the observation that the packing company organized by Van Camp was a successful venture, and produced large returns. In March of 1916 defendant Van Camp married the plaintiff, who was or had been an employee in the post office at San Pedro. Plaintiff was then 21 years of age; the defendant was about 54 years old. Immediately upon the marriage, defendant purchased a home in the city of Los Angeles, expending therefor about the sum of $15,000, and the deed to the place was made to the wife. Not long thereafter defendant delivered to the wife a certificate of deposit representing a cash credit of $10,000 and a deed to a lot at San Pedro. Defendant further provided each month for the plaintiff a cash allowance for household expenses which, at the time of the commencement of this proceeding, was $450; he also provided plaintiff with an automobile. The evidence goes to show that defendant was in the main liberal in the direction of gratifying all the wishes of his wife as to things desired for her pleasure and comfort. The mother of plaintiff resided at San Pedro and received partial support, at least, from the exchequer of Van Camp.

[1, 2] Considering the question as to whether the evidence is sufficient to sustain the findings of the court as to the facts upon which the decree of divorce is based, we are not permitted to weigh testimony and determine as to where the preponderance lies, for, in the presence of a conflict such as appears here upon most of the issues, the determination of the trial judge as to facts must be deemed conclusive. The evidence then must be viewed from the standpoint that will give to it the strongest weight in sustaining the findings of the court. The record of the evidence is of large volume, and in support of the plaintiff's case it shows that several years after the marriage of the parties, particularly in the year 1919, defendant Van Camp was often seen in the company of the corespondent, who was employed in the office of the Van Camp Company; that the two would be together in the automobile of defendant, and that the frequency of their association in that manner was brought to the attention of plaintiff's family and others, and also reported to the plaintiff; that upon one of the earlier occasions plaintiff remonstrated with her husband, and he admitted the wrongfulness of his conduct, and promised not to repeat it; notwithstanding that promise he continued to conduct himself in the same manner with the corespondent; that he neglected the plaintiff in the home, became irritable, and upon one occasion, when she took a paper from his hand and requested him to talk to her, struck her and called her "a damn fool"; that upon another occasion he drove in his automobile with the corespondent away from the traveled highway and into a thickly-wooded grove, where he remained for considerable time alone with the corespondent; that plaintiff at this time, in company with her mother and another person, pursued defendant into the grove and upbraided him with accusations of improper conduct, to which accusations he made the response that he had nothing to say; that plaintiff, prior to the alleged misconduct of the defendant, had been well, and not affected by illness of any kind, but that the knowledge of the alleged misdoings of the defendant so preyed upon her mind that she became nervous and ill; that she was unable to sleep, and cried a great deal.

[3] There was sufficient corroboration of the particulars furnished to satisfy the requirement of the Code. Defendant admitted the occurrence in the grove, when he was accosted by the wife. He claimed that he had merely stopped to eat fruit with the corespondent, but expressly declined to make any explanation as to why he had selected a secluded place away from the main thoroughfare. Appellant makes the point that all of the acts found by the court to have been committed by him which tended to show improper relations with the corespondent were acts showing, if anything, only an adulterous intent, and that they were not available to the plaintiff for the purpose of establishing any cause of action except that of adultery. This contention rests upon the early cases of Haskell v. Haskell, 54 Cal. 262, and Waldron v. Waldron, 85 Cal. 251, 24 Pac. 649, 858, 9 L. R. A. 487. These decisions do give decided aid to the contention, but are not now the law. See Barnes v. Barnes, 95 Cal. 171, 30 Pac. 298, 16 L. R. A. 660; Wolff v. Wolff, 102 Cal. 433, 36 Pac. 767, 1037.

[4] Acts and conduct of either spouse, unjustifiable under a reasonable rule of marital behavior, which in any case may cause great physical suffering or mental torture, are sufficient to sustain a charge of extreme cruelty. We state that as a general proposition, but it is subject always to the qualification that conduct which may in one case cause such suffering may not, in another, have the same effect. Thus the use of vulgar and profane epithets may, in the case of a highly cultured, refined, and sensitive woman, produce an effect of great mental anguish; while the same conduct may not, in the case of a woman of no refinement and of coarse nature, have any such effect at all. Hence, in the first case the charge of extreme cruelty might be sustained by the evidence; in the second case it would not be.

"Whether in any given case there has been inflicted this 'grievous mental suffering' is a pure question of fact, to be deduced from all the circumstances of each particular case, keeping always in view the intelligence, apparent refinement, and delicacy of sentiment of the complaining party; and no arbitrary rule of law as to what particular probative facts shall exist in order to justify a finding of the ultimate facts of its existence can be given." Barnes v. Barnes, supra.

In the case before us, where a girl of 21 is shown to have married a man of 54, we would be inclined to be very skeptical as to the truth of any claim that, by reason of the alleged acts of defendant toward the named corespondent, plaintiff's mental suffering was in anywise attributable to the fear alone that the bond of affection between her and her husband might be ruptured. The story, as it is told in the printed pages of the record, suggests strongly a marriage of convenience so far as the plaintiff is concerned.

However, there are other factors to be considered, and under one phase of the case it cannot be said that the court was without warrant in finding that the plaintiff had suffered in the manner described in the complaint and findings. She presented a state of facts showing that the actions of defendant with and toward the alleged corespondent were noted by her family and others, and created comment and gossip, and that she was humiliated thereby and caused to suffer greatly in her mind. Whether or not her feeling toward her husband was one of lively affection, she was satisfied in her marital relations, her home was established, and her future comfort apparently assured. The conduct of the husband, as the evidence shows and the findings determine it to have been, might well be said to have rendered intolerable a continuance of the marital partnership, and to have caused the plaintiff to be humiliated and consequently disturbed in mind. That question was one peculiarly within the province of the trial judge to determine. The demeanor, appearance and mental makeup of the complainant were all factors which would be proper to be considered, none of which can find much expression in the narrative of the testimony as it appears in cold type. And so we think, as we have already stated, that the case in its facts is put without the province of this court to draw conclusions on the question of cruelty different from those which have been assigned by the trial judge.

In the foregoing we have made no attempt to set forth with any degree of detail the substance of the testimony which was presented at the trial. A much lengthier statement would be required if we were to make that effort, and, furthermore, it is only necessary that enough be stated to show that there was some substantial evidence presented by the plaintiff in support of the charge of cruelty as made in her complaint. We attach no significance to the phrase used by the trial judge in qualifying the finding negativing the adultery charges, which stated that while those charges were untrue plaintiff had reasonable cause to believe that they were true. This language was probably incorporated in the findings for the purpose only of showing that the adultery charges made by the plaintiff were not made with the idea of willfully imposing upon the court. The qualifying words might be eliminated from the findings altogether without affecting the conclusions in any respect. No errors of a substantial nature were committed by the lower court in receiving or rejecting evidence.

The community property allotment: It appears that during the existence of the marital relation, defendant transferred and conveyed to plaintiff certain real estate of the value of $33,000, a certificate of deposit of $10,000, and a Liberty bond of the denomination of $5,000, making a total of $48,000, which property, together with certain personal property and household furnishings, the court found was the sole and separate estate of plaintiff. While there is a conflict in the testimony touching the question, the evidence was sufficient to show that all of said property so found to be the separate estate of plaintiff became such by gifts from defendant to plaintiff. As before stated, the court found that there was community property of the plaintiff and defendant Frank Van Camp of the value of $90,000, and by the judgment awarded plaintiff two-thirds of said sum.

[5, 6] Defendant, as appellant, attacks this finding upon the ground that the evidence is insufficient to support the same, and plaintiff, on her appeal, insists that the evidence shows that the value of the community property of the parties was largely in excess of the amount found by the court. Section 163, Civil Code, provides that—

> "All property owned by the husband before marriage * * * with the rents, issues and profits thereof, is his separate property."

Notwithstanding this declaration, the rule is that all property in the possession of either husband or wife is deemed to be community estate of the parties. Freese v. Hibernia, etc., Society, 139 Cal. 392, 73 Pac. 172; Estate of Pepper, 158 Cal. 619, 112 Pac. 62, 31 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1092. Since, however, the presumption attending such possession is a disputable one, either spouse claiming to the contrary may controvert the presumption and offer evidence to overcome the same. From the evidence offered touching the question, it appears without dispute that at the time of his marriage to plaintiff defendant was a man of large means, which included cash, notes, real estate, and corporate stock; that at the time he was president and manager of a corporation known as the Van Camp Sea Food Company, to the management of the affairs of which he devoted his exclusive attention, and for the services so rendered to said corporation received therefrom, up to January, 1918, the sum of $1,000 per month, which, commencing with January, 1918, was increased to $1,500 per month; that, in addition to such salary, he received from said company during the period of the marital relation an additional sum of $12,203 for the purpose of meeting expenses incurred by him in connection with the business; that during the period in question he was engaged in no other business whatsoever, and, excepting the money so received from said corporation, he had no income other than that derived as rents, issues, and profits from the property owned by him at the time of his marriage. The total amount received by him from said corporation on account of salary and expense money during the existence of the marital relation was the sum of $69,203. It therefore follows that all other income, large or small, and regardless of the amount thereof, must necessarily have been derived from the property which he owned at the time of his marriage.

[7] In the absence of any evidence showing a different practice (and there is none) the rule is that the community earnings of husband and wife are chargeable with the family support. Estate of Cudworth, 133 Cal. 462, 65 Pac. 1041. Hence any amounts of money expended for such purpose by either spouse during the existence of the marital relation are presumed to have been paid out of the community estate. It appears that during such period defendant expended for the support of his family, and for income tax and premiums on policies of life insurance wherein his estate was made the beneficiary, the sum of $84,576. The premiums on his life insurance so paid were not a charge upon the community estate. Neither was the entire sum of $18,380 paid by defendant on account of income tax, a charge thereon. Just what proportion of said income tax should be charged to defendant's personal earnings is not made to appear; but, conceding for the purpose of the argument that the community estate be deemed free from such burden, and the entire sum so paid be imposed upon defendant's other income, and deducting both the life insurance premiums and income tax, the aggregate of which is $23,946, from the total of $84,576 so expended, leaves a balance of $60,630 as the amount actually expended for the community benefit and chargeable to his community earnings of $69,203. This leaves to the credit of the community estate the amount of $8,573, which sum, however, should be further reduced to the extent of the amount chargeable against it on account of its proportion of the income tax so paid by defendant. It thus appears that the evidence is insufficient to show the existence of a community estate of plaintiff and defendant of the value of $90,000, and, since his earnings from personal service rendered did not exceed the sum of $69,203, the balance of his income, whatever it may have been, was necessarily derived from the rents, issues and profits of the property which he owned at the time of his marriage. In our opinion, the evidence is as conclusive of that fact as though defendant had, upon proof of the property owned by him at the time of his marriage, shown the exact income derived therefrom.

Hence, conceding, as argued by counsel for Mrs. Van Camp, that defendant at the time of the trial admitted the possession of cash, bonds, and other property acquired during the marriage, the value of which was in excess of the large income admittedly received during said time, nevertheless it cannot be said to have constituted community estate of the parties, but, for the reason that, as heretofore stated, his personal earnings having been conclusively fixed, any excess in value of property so acquired must be accredited to the income received from rents, issues, and profits of the separate estate, rather than to the income of the joint efforts of the community. And further, conceding that Van Camp, according to figures tabulated by counsel for the wife, accumulated (in addition to the amount received for his services from the corporation during the marriage and, as shown, exhausted in the payment of household expenses) property, other than that owned at the time of the marriage, of the value of $241,000, such sum is largely offset by $141,000 received in dividends from the Van Camp Sea Food Co. alone, while $48,000 was given to his wife, and a large sum on profits derived from sales of stock in said company, making a total approximating, if not equal to, the amount so claimed by plaintiff to have been received by him; all of which appears to have been the result of investments from his separate estate. Hence, assuming that defendant did not fully disclose the full amount of his separate income, which was in excess of that stated by him, and that he had acquired other property with such undisclosed income during the marriage, such property, since it was not acquired with his earnings, cannot be deemed community estate.

It is insisted by counsel for Mrs. Van Camp that the Van Camp Sea Food Company, if not a myth, was a mere agency through which defendant conducted his business, and, since its enormous income was due to the skill and ability with which defendant conducted the business, the community estate should be accredited with all the profits derived therefrom in excess of 7 per cent. interest upon the capital which defendant had invested therein. In support of this contention she cites Pereira v. Pereira, 156 Cal. 1, 103 Pac. 488, 23 L. R. A. (N. S.) 880, 134 Am. St. Rep. 107, wherein it appeared that the husband at the time of the marriage had a separate estate of $15,500 invested in a business conducted by him. The trial court held that all moneys and profits derived by defendant after marriage through his personal management of such business belonged to the community estate. On an appeal by the husband, the Supreme Court, in discussing the question, said:

"This capital was undoubtedly his separate estate. The fund remained in the business after marriage and was used by him in carrying it on. The separate property should have been credited with some amount as profit on this capital. It was not a losing business, but a very profitable one. It is true that it is very clearly shown that the principal part of the large income was due to the personal character, energy, ability, and capacity of the husband. This share of the earnings was, of course, community property. But without capital he could not have carried on the business. In the absence of circumstances showing a different result, it is to be presumed that some of the profits were justly due to the capital invested. There is nothing to show that all of it was due to defendant's efforts alone. The probable contribution of the capital to the income should have been determined from all the circumstances of the case, and, as the business was profitable it would amount at least to the usual interest on a long investment well secured."

In our opinion, the circumstances attending the Pereira Case are not applicable to the facts involved herein. While it may be true that the success of the corporation of which defendant was president and manager was to a large extent due to his capacity and ability, nevertheless without the investment of his and other capital in the corporation he could not have conducted the business; and while he devoted his energies and personal efforts to making it a success, he was by the corporation paid what the evidence shows was an adequate salary, and for which another than himself with equal capacity could have been secured. Had such course been pursued and defendant contented himself merely with the receipt of dividends from the business, the character of the dividends as separate property could not have been questioned. Instead, however, of doing this, he entered upon the duties as manager of the corporation, gave his exclusive time and efforts thereto, for which he received first $12,000, and later $18,000 per year. The case presented is not unlike that involved in Estate of Pepper, 158 Cal. 619, 112 Pac. 62, 31 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1092, wherein it was held that the profits and earnings made by the husband after marriage in conducting the business of a nursery upon property owned by him at the time of his marriage was his separate property, notwithstanding the success of the venture required industry, skill, and attention.

"It is * * * impossible," said the court, "to apportion the crop so as to determine what share of it has come from the soil and what share from the exertions of man. The product must be treated as a whole, and, if it is the growth of land separately owned, it is the separate property of the owner of the land"—citing Diefendorff v. Hopkins, 95 Cal. 343, 28 Pac. 265, 30 Pac. 549.

So in the instant case, it is impossible to say what part of the enormous dividends paid by the Van Camp Sea Food Company should be apportioned to the skill and management thereof and what part should be apportioned to the investment of the capital and the favorable conditions under which the business was conducted. Furthermore, there is no merit in the contention that the corporation was a myth, or that it was a mere instrumentality through which defendant conducted his business. It was organized in June, 1914, long before defendant's marriage, with a capital of $200,000, consisting of 2,000 shares of the par value of $100 each, of which stock Van Camp at the time acquired 1,300 shares, Paul Eachus 500 shares, and F. H. Ford 200 shares, besides two shares distributed to others, who, with the persons named, constituted the five directors of the corporation. Subsequently, for the sum of $20,000, defendant acquired the 200 shares of stock issued to Ford, and in March, 1915, for $35,000, he bought the stock issued to Paul Eachus. Later he sold 83 shares of his stock to Wilbur Wood, and, prior to his marriage, sold to his son 300 shares thereof for the sum of $45,000. At no time did he own more than 1,499 shares of the stock. The corporation was duly organized and constituted an entity separate and distinct from that of defendant. Even were it otherwise, and, as claimed by plaintiff, a mere instrumentality for conducting defendant's business, nevertheless, in view of the fact that he was adequately paid by the corporation for his services, such compensation, under the holding in the case of Estate of Pepper, supra, must be deemed the extent of his personal earnings, and the balance of the profits derived from the business accredited to the use of the capital invested therein, in the same manner as though he had not been employed by the corporation.

The judgment as entered on the divorce issues is affirmed.

The judgment as to the amount and value of the community property and as to the disposition thereof between the parties is reversed, and the cause is remanded for a new trial upon that issue alone; appellant Frank Van Camp to have his costs of appeal.

53 Cal. App. 157

KING v. TARABINO. (Civ. 3550.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2. California. June 11, 1921.)

1. Alteration of instruments ⟸27(3) — "Execution" in statute relative to altered instruments means "signing" or "signature."

The word "execution," in Code Civ. Proc. § 1982, providing that the party producing a writing as genuine which has been altered, or appears to have been altered, after its execution, in a part material to the question in dispute, must account for the appearance or alteration, means "signing" or "signature."

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phases, First and Second Series, Execution (Writ of); Sign—Signature.]

2. Alteration of instruments ⟸27(3) — After signing casts burden to explain on party producing it.

Where, after the drawer of a check wrote at its bottom "Owen Aparment, By John Tarabino," some person expunged the first line of the signature, leaving standing only the words "By John Tarabino," there was a plain alteration of the instrument after execution within Code Civ. Proc. § 1982, casting the burden on the party producing it to account for such alteration; the alteration being material to the question, as after it the check was being pressed against the estate of John and not the funds in the name of the Owen Apartments.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Paul J. McCormick, Judge.

Action by E. M. King against Barney Tarabino, executor of the estate of John Tarabino, deceased. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Judgment reversed, and cause remanded.

Arthur W. Eckman and T. K. Hulme, both of Los Angeles, and Frank Snyder, of Glendale, for appellant.

Mattison B. Jones, of Los Angeles, and Linneman & Linneman, for respondent.

WORKS, J. This is an action to recover on a check for $5,000. Defendant appeals from a judgment for plaintiff. The cause was tried by a jury.

Two brothers, John and Barney Tarabino, owned and operated an apartment house known as the Owen Apartments, John, although a man of little education, being the manager of the place. The funds of the business were deposited in bank in an account against which checks were drawn over the signature, "Owen Apartments, By John Tarabino." John Tarabino also carried an account in bank in his own name in which his individual funds were deposited. The check which is the basis of the action was originally signed, in the handwriting of John Tarabino, as follows: "Owen Aparment, By John Tarabino." All other written matter on the instrument, the date, respondent's name as payee, and the amount, both in figures and words, was in the handwriting of respondent. The words "Owen Aparment," in the signature, were stricken out by several straight lines drawn longitudinally through them, so that the signature was finally left, below the expunged words, thus: "By John Tarabino." John having died, the check was, two months after that event, presented for payment by respondent at the bank in which his individual account was kept, but payment was refused. A creditors' claim, based upon the paper, was next presented to the executor of John's estate, and was rejected. The present action was then commenced against the executor. Under stipulation of the parties we have before us the original check, a photographic enlargement of it showing a surface about 1½ times its length, and a second photographic enlargement to about twice its length.

Upon proof of the genuineness of the signature, "By John Tarabino," and without any explanation of the alteration by means of which the words "Owen Aparment" had been expunged, and over the objection of appellant, the trial court received the check in evidence. It is contended that the ruling was error.

In most jurisdictions the question whether an alteration of a written instrument must be explained before it is admissible in evidence depends upon the time when the alteration was made, having regard to the delivery of the instrument, although in the law of those places the time spoken of is the time of the execution of the instrument, the latter term generally being held to include both signing and delivery (2 C. J. 1223); and "in many states it is held that an apparent alteration is presumed, in the absence of any explanation, to have been made simultaneously with or before the delivery of the instrument and hence no explanation is required. In other states it has been held that there is no presumption either way; and in still others that the presumption is that the alteration was made after delivery." Meyer v. Lovdal, 6 Cal. App. 369, 92 Pac. 322. All of these rules of law have been supplanted in this state, formally, by section 1982, Code Civil Procedure; and we say "formally" because the extent to which they have been supplanted, actually and substantially, depends upon a construction of the section. The enactment provides that—

"The party producing a writing as genuine which has been altered, or appears to have been altered, after its execution, in a part material to the question in dispute, must account for the appearance or alteration."

After setting out several ways in which an alteration may be accounted for, the section concludes with a provision that, if the party producing a writing does account for an alteration in it, "he may give the writing in evidence, but not otherwise."

The facts of this case require us to determine whether the Legislature intended the word "execution," as employed in section 1982, to include delivery, or whether it intended the expression as synonymous with signing, only. The word "execute," in strict legal parlance, usually, but not always, includes delivery; while, in ordinary lay language, "to execute" is often regarded as the equivalent of "to sign." Words and Phrases (1st and 2d Eds.) tit. Execute. Which sense did the legislature intend in section 1982? A potent guide to a solution of the question will be found in this undoubted fact: If it were intended that the time of the alteration, with reference to the execution, were ever to be ascertained from the face of an instrument alone, then "execution," in the section, means "signing." This is necessarily true, for the actual time of delivery of an instrument, whatever recitals it may contain as to delivery, cannot by any possibility be determined from an inspection of it. That circumstance always must be ascertained through the medium of evidence extraneous to the writing. Further, even if evidence dehors a given writing were received for the purpose of fixing the time of its delivery, we can conceive of no circumstances under which an inspection of it would show whether an alteration of its language were made before or after the time of delivery thus ascertained.

With this irrefragable premise in mind, let us take a glance at the section itself, in an endeavor to ascertain whether, inherent to it, there may be found an index to its construction. The enactment deals with two classes of instruments, those which have been altered after their execution and those which appear to have been altered after that event. A certainty of alteration after execution is contemplated in providing for the first class, but only the appearance of alteration in naming the second. Is not the section so framed as to indicate that the "appearance" is to be gathered from the face of the paper? The language of the law is not so couched as to give strength to the view that the possibility of alteration is to appear from extrinsic evidence. But there is another clause of the enactment which conduces to the view which we are inclined to take of its meaning from its very terms, unaided by other considerations. Where the instrument appears to have been altered after execution, the party producing it "must account for the appearance." Does not that language show that the thing he is to account for is the "appearance" on the face of the writing?

There are, however, most weighty considerations, apart from the language of the section itself, leading to the conclusion that the Legislature intended the word "execution" as the equivalent of "signing." While the question has never been directly decided, the courts of review of the state have often indicated that to be the proper construction of the law, and we propose to refer to the many cases bearing on the question, even if some of them do touch but lightly on the point. Taking them all, it will appear that a mass of matter has been accumulated upon the subject. Wherever italics are used it will be understood that they are our own.

We first cite a case which antedates the Code, Roberts v. Unger, 30 Cal. 676. A change had there been made in the description in a deed. "The plaintiffs then introduced evidence tending to show that the erasure and interlineation had been made at the time the deed was drawn and before signing." The syllabus is to the effect that—

"An alteration in a deed by an erasure of a figure and the interlineation of another is not sufficient to prevent it from being received in evidence where testimony is introduced tending to show that the alteration was made before the deed was signed."

The weight of this case is very slight, almost negligible, but we note it as a part of the judicial history of the state on the question. The syllabus, while it is, of course, in no sense authority, has stood all these years, however, as suggesting to bench and bar that the signing is the thing. The reference is not to delivery, nor even to signing and delivery.

We next mention Corcoran v. Doll, 32 Cal. 82. In this case the whole tenor of the opinion, taken in connection with the statement of facts, seems to indicate that the court used the word "execution" as synonymous with "signing." In addition, the situation seems to have been gathered from the face of the note, there in question, where nothing concerning delivery appeared or could have appeared.

In Sedgwick v. Sedgwick, 56 Cal. 213, the opinion is not clear, but it tends to show that the time of signature is the period to be considered in determining whether an alteration appears, within the terms of section 1982. The signature to the instrument was proved, and it was then offered. This was followed by an objection to its admissibility on the ground that it appeared on the face of the paper and from the testimony of the witnesses that it had been changed after its execution. The report does not show what, if any, testimony there was on the subject, and the syllabus, while not authority, is to the effect that the question was determined from the face of the writing alone.

Miller v. Luco, 80 Cal. 257, 22 Pac. 195, is decidedly in point, though the report on the subject is not full. A tax deed had been offered in evidence. The Supreme Court said:

"The plaintiffs objected to the deed being received in evidence, on the ground that it appeared on the face thereof to have been altered in a material respect after its execution, and the court sustained the objection. We see no error in this ruling. It was fully justified by section 1982 of the Code of Civil Procedure."

The syllabus, not, however, treating it as authority, is to the effect that—

"A tax deed which appears upon the face thereof to have been altered in a material respect after its execution is not admissible in evidence to show title in the holder thereof."

The language of both opinion and syllabus is striking when we remember that nothing more could have appeared from the face of the instrument than that it was altered after signature.

In Burdell v. Taylor, 89 Cal. 613, 26 Pac. 1094, the court said:

"The further point is made that the court erred in admitting in evidence the record of survey No. 61, because it appeared to be interlined, and no sufficient explanation given thereof. Even conceding that the objection made was sufficient, although not pointing to the particular respect in which the document was inadmissible, by stating that it was because of an interlineation, still it appears that Easkoot, the maker and recorder of the survey, showed that the interlineation was made before execution thereof by him. This was sufficient. Code Civ. Proc. § 1982; Sedgwick v. Sedgwick, 56 Cal. 213."

This case is deprived of much of its weight because of the fact that the writing in question was not one which became effective upon delivery; but the fact is noteworthy that the court used "execution" as the equivalent of "signature," and did so immediately preceding a citation of section 1982. It is also to be noted that Sedgwick v. Sedgwick is cited in support of the text.

The question of the application of section 1982 next arose in Manuel v. Flynn, 5 Cal. App. 319, 90 Pac. 463. The court there took the extreme ground that alterations appearing from the face of an instrument to have been made after it was completely written must have been explained before the writing could be received, apparently laying aside all question of either signature or delivery. It was said:

"The written agreement to which we have referred as having been entered into, * * * and which was received in evidence, was objected to by appellant because it had been altered in some respects. The instrument upon its face presented evidence of having been at some time altered after it was written. This objection having been made, the burden was upon plaintiff to explain or account for such alterations, if they involved a part thereof material to the question in dispute. Code Civ. Proc. § 1982."

Of all the cases bearing upon the construction to be placed on the word "execution" in section 1982, Meyer v. Lovdal, 6 Cal. App. 369, 92 Pac. 322, comes nearest the mark. The following appears in the course of the opinion:

"It is urged that the court erred in receiving in evidence the note over defendant's objection. The note * * * reads: 'Thirty days after date without grace I promise to pay,' etc. The words 'Thirty days' show that a pen was drawn through them and directly thereunder the words 'Six months' written. * * * The only objection argued in the brief at this point is that plaintiff should have explained the alteration as to the maturity of the note before offering it, and that it was error to admit it without such explanation. * * * In the present case it is alleged in the answer that the alteration was made after delivery, and that plaintiff took the note after its maturity, i. e., more than 30 days after its execution. The alteration then was material to the question in dispute. We find no case in our reports, and none is cited, where the meaning of this section [1982], in the particular now under consideration, is clearly stated. When the instrument is offered without explanation as to an apparent alteration, how is it to be known whether or not it 'appears to have been altered after its execution' unless this may be determined, in the first instance, by an inspection of the instrument itself and the alteration shown therein? The trial judge must, it seems to us, determine when the offer is made whether the alterations are such as, in his judgment, call for explanation. If he admits the instrument and nothing appears in the record to show that the judgment exercised by the trial judge was improper or not justified, it is the duty of the appellate court to accept his conclusion. We must assume that he had the instrument before him and scrutinized its appearance in order to determine whether it was altered after its execution, and unless the record brought up for review shows that he acted without warrant his determination is conclusive upon us. We have nothing before us but a photographic copy of the note, and we can discover nothing from it that would suggest unauthorized action by the trial judge."

It is evident from the court's use of the word "apparent," in this opinion, that the view of section 1982 which we have suggested above in our scrutiny of the language of the enactment was entertained by the court; that is, that the "appearance" to be accounted for by one offering an apparently altered writing is the "appearance" on the face of the writing. In fact, that view is reflected throughout the excerpt we have made from the opinion. In view of the premise we have laid down above, it is especially to be noted that the "appearance" is to be ascertained, at least in the first instance, from an inspection by the trial judge of the writing offered. The controlling effect of this position is manifest when we remember, to repeat, that such an inspection can never aid in determining whether an instrument has been altered after delivery, but that it will often indicate whether an alteration has been made after signature.

We mention, in passing, Cavitt v. Raje, 29 Cal. App. 659, 156 Pac. 519, and Johnson v. Cordes, 33 Cal. App. 619, 165 Pac. 1040, although they have no bearing upon the particular question under discussion. They do, however, both of them, indicate with what freedom the word "execution" is used, even by the courts, as synonymous with "signing," or "signature." That use is particularly noticeable in Johnson v. Cordes.

The last case we shall notice is Dozier v. National Borax Co., 35 Cal. App. 612, 170 Pac. 638, for it is the latest and only remaining one on the subject. In speaking of an alteration in an agreement for the sale of stock the court said:

"The interlineation of these words in this writing * * * was an afterthought to its creation, and also * * * works a most material alteration in its terms; and having been confessedly inserted after the execution of the writing by Dake, the burden of accounting for it was cast upon the plaintiff producing the writing and relying upon it as genuine under the express terms of section 1982 of the Code of Civil Procedure."

Such language necessarily conveys the idea that the court viewed the word "execution" in the statute as the equivalent of "signing."

[1, 2] We conclude, not merely from the language of section 1982, but from the construction tacitly placed upon it by the courts in so many instances—and there are no cases indicating a contrary view—that the Legislature intended the word "execution," as used in the enactment, as the equivalent of "signing," or "signature." What, then, is the situation in the present case? Following the guide furnished by Meyer v. Lovdal, the trial judge made an inspection of the check in order to solve the question which the objection of counsel presented to him; but he scanned it with an improper purpose in view, a purpose impossible of accomplishment. He endeavored to ascertain whether the check had been altered after its delivery. An inspection for such a purpose was a futility. But what does the face of the paper show upon the really material question: Was the check altered after it was signed? There can be but one answer. John Tarabino wrote at the bottom of the paper, "Owen Aparment, By John Tarabino," thus completing, so far as the judge could ascertain from inspection, his work upon the instrument. That, but for the palpable alteration, was the signature to the check, the signature contemplated by section 1982. After that work was done some person expunged the first line of the signature, leaving standing only the words "By John Tarabino," thus, to our minds, showing a plain alteration of the instrument after execution, under the terms of the section.

In looking to the language of section 1982 to the effect that, to require explanation, an alteration must be material to the question in dispute, we have no difficulty in concluding that the one before us is within the terms of the enactment. As originally signed the check was drawn against the funds in bank of the Owen Apartments, the funds of John and Barney Tarabino. As altered, the instrument is being pressed against the estate of John. It is obvious that the alteration was a most material one.

Several other points are made by appellant, but they need not be considered. In fact, most of them depend upon the question which we have discussed above.

The judgment is reversed and the cause is remanded.

PEOPLE v. ALBA. (Cr. 761.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. May 11, 1921.)

1. Larceny ⊂=56—Evidence held to show corpus delicti.

In a prosecution for grand larceny of a horse, evidence held to show the corpus delicti.

2. Criminal law ⊂=563—"Corpus delicti" may be established by some evidence tending to establish a criminal agency.

"Corpus delicti" consists of two elements, the facts forming its basis and the existence of a criminal agency, as the cause of them, and is sufficiently established if there is some evidence tending to establish a criminal agency; it being unnecessary to establish the corpus delicti beyond a reasonable doubt.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Corpus Delicti.]

3. Larceny ⊂=56 — Evidence tending to show criminal taking of property necessary to establish corpus delicti.

In prosecution for larceny, the evidence to establish the corpus delicti must tend to show a criminal taking of the property.

4. Criminal law ⊂=413(2)—Testimony that defendant had told witness that another man had stolen horse and had sold it to defendant held admissible.

In a prosecution for larceny of a horse, found near defendant's camp, in which there was evidence sufficient to establish the corpus delicti, testimony that the defendant had told witness that another man had stolen the horse, and had sold it to him, held properly admitted.

5. Criminal law ⊂=554, 555—Jury need not believe testimony given by defendant and his wife and child.

The jury was not compelled to believe the testimony of the defendant, his wife, and little boy.

6. Larceny ⊂=77(1) — Instruction on unexplained possession of property as circumstance showing guilt held not erroneous.

In prosecution for grand larceny, instruction as to unexplained possession of stolen property as a circumstance showing guilt held not erroneous.

7. Criminal law ⊂=822(1) — No error, if instructions as a whole correctly state law.

Instructions must be read as a whole, and if, when so read, they state the law correctly, no error is committed.

8. Larceny ⊂=77(3)—Evidence held to justify instruction on unexplained possession of stolen property.

In prosecution for larceny of a horse, evidence held to justify instruction on unexplained possession of recently stolen property as a circumstance tending to show guilt.

9. Criminal law ⊂=1186(4)—Error to warrant reversal must have resulted in miscarriage of justice.

Under Const. art. 6, § 4½, it is not sufficient to warrant a reversal to show that error was committed, but the appellate court must be of the opinion that the error has resulted in a miscarriage of justice.

10. Larceny ⊂=65 — Evidence held to sustain conviction.

Evidence held to sustain a conviction of grand larceny of a horse.

11. Criminal law ⊂=561(1)—Jury required to convict, if convinced beyond reasonable doubt after considering all evidence, including defendant's.

It is the duty of the jury to weigh all the evidence, and if, from the entire evidence, including that given by the defendant, they were convinced of defendant's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt, the jury should convict.

Appeal from Superior Court, Imperial County; Franklin J. Cole, Judge.

Jose Alba was convicted of grand larceny. From a judgment of conviction, and from an order denying his motion for new trial, he appeals. Affirmed.

Banta & Banta, of El Centro, for appellant.
U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Arthur Keetch, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

CRAIG, J. The defendant was charged with the crime of grand larceny. He was tried and convicted. An appeal is taken from the judgment and from the order denying motion for a new trial. The principal question presented upon the appeal is based upon the contention that the evidence did not establish a corpus delicti, and that the horse may have wandered away instead of being stolen.

[1] The material facts of the case are as follows: Pete Cooper, an Indian, was the owner of a mare, which has been his since 1914. At the trial he testified that on the night of November 18, 1920, he had this mare on his place in Imperial county, near Yuma. He staked her out, but on the following morning she was not there. He examined the stake hole and it was straight. He knew the mare's footmarks, and followed them for about 7 miles; they led in the direction of Holtville. There were also buggy tracks and the marks of another horse's hoofs, and all of these led directly from the witness' house. On the next day the witness found the horse in the corral in Holtville, where it had been taken by the town marshal. Gillette, the town marshal of Holtville, testified that on the 19th day of November he drove from Holtville on the Yuma road, and about a mile and a half outside of Holtville on the road he found a mare, which proved to be Pete Cooper's, tied in the bushes near the defendant's camp. Defendant's two children were there, and a few minutes later the defendant and his wife drove up in a buggy. The mare in question was sweating. It appears that the camp where the horse was found was about 40 miles from Cooper's place, and about 24 hours had elapsed in making the journey. These facts are sufficient to constitute a corpus delicti.

[2-4] Appellant is wrong in his claim that the corpus delicti must be established beyond a reasonable doubt. It consists of two elements: First, the facts forming its basis; and, second, the existence of a criminal agency as the cause of them. It is sufficient if there is some evidence tending to establish a criminal agency. People v. Jones, 123 Cal. 65, 55 Pac. 698. In the case of larceny there must be evidence tending to show a criminal taking of the property in question. The corpus delicti having been established, the court properly admitted the testimony of Marshal Gillette that the defendant had told him that another man stole the horse and sold it to him.

[5] The defendant testified in his own behalf; his wife and little boy were also witnesses. Briefly, the defense as given by them was that defendant had bought the mare from a man named Theodore. The defendant had known this man for a long time. He knew that he lived in a town called Bard. Defendant had asked for a bill of sale, and it was agreed between them that upon defendant's return from his trip to Imperial Valley Theodore would supply it. The jury heard this evidence but were not compelled to believe it.

[6] Appellant complains of the following instruction:

"The mere possession of stolen property, unexplained by the defendant, however soon after the taking, is not sufficient to justify a conviction; it is merely a guilty circumstance, which, taken in connection with other testimony, is to determine the question of guilt. Yet, if you believe from the evidence that the defendant was found in the possession of the property described in the evidence, or claiming to be the owner thereof, this is a circumstance tending in some degree to show guilt, but not sufficient, standing alone and unsupported by other evidence, to warrant you in finding him guilty. There must be, in addition to proof of possession of property stolen from the premises described in evidence, proof of corroborating circumstances tending of themselves to establish guilt. These corroborating circumstances may consist of acts, or conduct, or declarations of the defendant, or any other circumstances tending to show the guilt of the accused.

"If the jury believes, from the evidence, the property mentioned in evidence was stolen from the premises described in evidence, and was seen in the possession of the defendant shortly after being stolen, the failure of the defendant to account for such possession, or to show that such possession was honestly obtained, is a circumstance tending to show his guilt, and accused is bound to explain the possession, in order to remove the effect of the possession as a circumstance to be considered in connection with other suspicious facts, if the evidence disclose such."

The part objected to we have italicized. Instructions almost identical in language and containing a statement of the same legal principle have been approved in many California cases. Some of these are as follows: People v. Velarde, 59 Cal. 457; People v. Etting, 99 Cal. 577, 34 Pac. 237; People v. King, 8 Cal. App. 329, 96 Pac. 916; People v. Abbott, 101 Cal. 645, 36 Pac. 129.

In the case of People v. Abbott, 101 Cal. 645, 36 Pac. 129, the exact instruction complained of in the instant case was given. It is true that in the Abbott Case it does not appear that defendant attempted to explain his possession of the property; but the court treated the language of the instruction given as the statement of a principle of law, and not as an assumption of fact. Again, in People v. Etting, 99 Cal. 577, 34 Pac. 237, we find the precise language used in the case of People v. Abbott, supra, and in the case at bar, although here, also, it does not appear from the opinion whether or not the defendant offered any explanation of his possession of the goods which had been stolen.

If appellant's criticism of this instruction is meritorious, the same objection applies to the language of the first paragraph of the instruction, especially as contained in the first sentence, for it may be said that the words "unexplained by the defendant" assume that the defendant has not explained his possession of the stolen property. However, this exact language was used in the case of People v. Velarde, 59 Cal. 457, and in that case the defendant did offer an explanation after admitting his possession of the property. In the case of People v. King, 8 Cal. App. 329, 96 Pac. 916, the instruction given in the instant case is used, with the exception that there the instruction refers to "a defendant," instead of "the defendant." While the article "a" is preferable to the article "the," in view of another instruction, given at defendant's request, it can hardly be said that the jury was misled by this slight difference in the wording of the two instructions.

[7] This instruction was that the possession of stolen property is a circumstance—

"which, if unexplained, might tend in some degree to show guilt, but is not sufficient, standing alone, even though unexplained and unsupported by other evidence, to warrant you in finding him guilty."

The instructions must be read as a whole, and, when so read, if they state the law correctly, no error is committed. People v. Etting, 99 Cal. 577, 34 Pac. 237. With the elucidation contained in instruction D–9, where the true rule, which the law required should be applied for measuring the value as evidence of an explanation offered by the defendant of his possession of stolen property, is clearly and correctly stated, it cannot be doubted that the jury was not misled by the inaccuracy of the language of instruction No. 13.

[8] In the case under consideration there was evidence from which it might be inferred that the mare had been feloniously taken. She was found in the possession of the defendant. Under these circumstances, the evidence justified the giving of the instruction. But appellant attempts to differentiate the cases in which the instruction in question has been approved from the one on appeal, because he asserts that in each of them the defendant offered no explanation of his possession of the stolen property. However, in People v. Velarde, supra, the opinion reads:

"If either of the facts stated by him, to wit, that he had raised the cattle, or that he had bought them, were true, it followed as a consequence that he was not guilty of the crime with which he was charged. It was only in connection with other facts, established by the evidence in the case, that they became matters of evidence against the defendant. He attempted to account for the possession of stolen property, but the account given by him was a false one, and was shown by comparison with other facts proved in the case, and it thereby became a circumstance unfavorable to the hypothesis of defendant's innocence."

[9, 10] Section 4½ of article 6 of the Constitution of the state of California provides:

"Unless, after an examination of the entire cause, including the evidence, the court shall be of the opinion that the error complained of has resulted in a miscarriage of justice," no new trial shall be granted in any criminal case on the ground of misdirection of the jury.

Under this provision it is the duty of the appellate court to review the evidence to determine whether or not a miscarriage of justice has resulted from any error committed. It is not sufficient to warrant a reversal to show that error was committed, but the appellate court must be of the opinion that the error has resulted in a miscarriage of justice. People v. Bartol, 24 Cal. App. 659, 142 Pac. 510. From an examination of the evidence in this case we are satisfied of the defendant's guilt, and that to uphold the verdict of the jury, rather than to set it aside, will best subserve the ends of justice.

[11] Complaint is made that the court erred in refusing to give certain instruction asked by the defendant. Defendant's offer No. 3–D was properly refused. The offered instruction was as follows:

"The burden of proof is upon the prosecution throughout this case to prove every element of the offense as charged beyond all reasonable doubt. The defendant is not required to produce any evidence in his own behalf, but may rely upon the weakness of the case as presented by the prosecution. Any evidence introduced by this defendant does not relieve the prosecution from this burden, nor is the defendant required to prove anything to be entitled to an acquittal at your hands." (That portion of the instruction which we have italicized renders the instruction erroneous.)

If the defendant wished to take the stand that the prosecution's evidence was insufficient, he could have rested without the introduction of evidence. However, it was the duty of the jury to weigh all of the testimony and if, from the entire evidence, including that given by the defendant, they were convinced of the defendant's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt, it was the duty of the jury to so find. The court fully instructed the jury upon its duty on the doctrine of reasonable doubt and the burden of proof, upon the effect of the possession of stolen property as an item of evidence, and upon the circumstantial evidence rule. It was not necessary that the further instruction offered by appellant upon these matters should be given. Without taking up each one of the instructions offered by appellant, and refused, and which it is contended should have been given, it is sufficient to say that a careful examination of the record satisfies us that each one which contains a correct statement of law was covered by some one of the instructions given.

The judgment is affirmed.

52 Cal. App. 765

PEOPLE v. DELANEY. (Cr. 748.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. May 24, 1921.)

1. Witnesses ⟸79(3) — Four year old boy may be competent witness.

Under the statute creating a presumption that a witness who has reached the age of 10 years is competent, and making a witness below that age competent unless it is shown to the trial judge that he is incapable of receiving just impressions of the facts, or of relating them truly, the extreme youthfulness of a four year old child is not per se sufficient to exclude him from the witness stand.

2. Witnesses ⟸79(2)—Competency of child should be determined from answers and appearance.

The competency of a 4 year old child to testify as a witness should be determined by the trial judge, not only from his answers to the questions asked on his preliminary examination, but also by his appearance and manner.

3. Criminal law ⟸1173(2)—Competency of child witness rests largely in trial court's discretion.

Because the trial judge has an opportunity to observe the child and listen to his manner of answering questions, the competency of the child is a question resting peculiarly in the trial court's discretion, and his ruling thereon will not be reversed unless there has been a clear abuse of discretion or manifest misapprehension of some legal principle.

4. Witnesses ⟸45(2)—Competency of child does not depend upon understanding of religious sanction of oath.

Under Const. art. 1, § 4, and Code Civ. Proc. § 1879, providing that no person may be excluded from the witness stand on account of his religious beliefs, the competency of a child as a witness does not depend upon his understanding that the force of an oath is rooted in religious sanctions.

5. Witnesses ⟸79(3)—Court's ruling as to child's capacity is conclusive on jury.

The ruling of the trial judge that a child is a competent witness to testify is conclusive on the jury as to the child's capacity, though the jury can determine the weight to be given his testimony.

6. Witnesses ⟸77—Refusal to permit accused to examine child witness held error.

Even though accused does not in all cases have a right to examine a child as to his competency as a witness after an examination by the court, the court's ruling in refusing to permit such examination where his own examination was too brief to afford any test of the child's intelligence was such an abuse of discretion as to require a reversal, where the child's testimony was the only testimony to sustain a conviction, and especially where the child's testimony at the preliminary examination disclosed a lack of competency.

Concurring Opinion.

7. Witnesses ⟸40(1)—Ability of child to observe facts depends on intelligence at time of event and ability to relate facts depends on intelligence at trial.

Under Code Civ. Proc. § 1880, subd. 2, making children incompetent as witnesses if it appears that they are incapable of receiving just impressions of the facts or if they are incapable of relating those facts truly, both tests are satisfied through the ability of the child to narrate the facts, considering the physical manifestations accompanying the narration, but the ability to receive just impressions must relate to the date of the occurrences which are under inquiry, while the ability to relate truly must relate to the date at which the child is offered as a witness.

8. Witnesses ⟸78—Testimony of child at preliminary examination indicates ability to receive true impressions.

In determining whether a child offered as a witness had the ability to receive true impressions of the facts, the testimony given at the preliminary examination, which was less remote from the time of the happening of the events described, is a better indication of whether the witness had received true impressions than his testimony at the trial 3½ months later.

9. Witnesses ⟸40(1)—Ability to relate facts is not ability to repeat relation by others.

The ability truly to relate facts, which is the test of the competency of a child under 10 years of age, depends upon his natural power of narration, exercised through his unprompted relation of such facts, and not upon a factitious ability to recite what he may have heard by frequent repetition from others.

10. Criminal law ⟸783½—Witnesses ⟸79(2)—Child witness manifesting incompetency to be removed from stand, and jury instructed to disregard testimony.

It is the duty of the trial judge who has permitted a child to be sworn as a witness, at any time to change his mind upon due occasion therefor, to remove the child from the stand, and to instruct the jury to disregard his testimony.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Frank R. Willis, Judge.

Earl F. Delaney was convicted of lewd and lascivious conduct, and he appeals from the judgment, and from an order denying his motion for a new trial. Reversed.

George H. Shreve and Cooper, Collings & Shreve, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Arthur Keetch, Deputy Atty. Gen., and John W. Maltman, of Los Angeles, for the People.

FINLAYSON, P. J. Defendant was convicted under an information charging him with lewd and lascivious conduct upon the body of a boy. At the time of the offense, the child victim was not quite 4 years old; at the date of the trial he had reached the age of about four years and two months. Defendant appeals from the judgment and an order denying his motion for a new trial.

It is objected that the court erred in permitting the boy to testify as a witness in the case, the claim being that, by reason of his immature years, he was incompetent under section 1880 of the Code of Civil Procedure, subsection 2 whereof provides that "children under ten years of age who appear incapable of receiving just impressions of the facts respecting which they are examined, or of relating them truly," cannot be witnesses.

The examination of the boy upon his voir dire, conducted by the court without the assistance of counsel, was meager to a degree. The record shows that the boy was called to the witness stand by the prosecution, and that the following then ensued:

"Q. (by the Court). Do you know me? You do not know me, do you? What is your name? A. My name is Junior Seiler.

"Q. How old are you? A. I am 4 years old.

"Q. Have you ever been in court before?

A. Yes. (Referring, evidently, to the preliminary examination of defendant before the committing magistrate.)

"Q. Do you go to Sunday School? A. Yes.

"Q. Whom do you live with? A. With my mother.

"Q. Does your mother teach you to tell the truth? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. What happens to boys who do not tell the truth? What do they do to boys who do not tell the truth? A. Put them in jail.

"Q. Have you ever been in jail yet? A. No.

"Q. Do you know what it is to tell the truth? A. M'h'm.

"Mr. Shreve: If your honor please, before your honor finishes, I would like to have an opportunity of asking the child some questions also.

"The Court: No; I think this is a matter for the court.

"Mr. Shreve: It is a rather serious matter to undertake to try to let a child like that prove the corpus delicti.

"The Court: It is a very serious matter to have a charge of this kind investigated at all.

"The Witness: Where is Mother, Daddy?

"The Court: If we let you tell your story—look here, little boy. What is your name? A. Junior Seiler.

"Q. If we let you tell your story here, will you tell us what is true? A. M'h'm.

"The Court: I think I will let the witness be sworn.

"Mr. Shreve: We object to the witness being sworn and testifying in the case, on the ground that he has shown himself disqualified, and at this time we will request the court to give us permission to further examine the child with reference to his qualifications.

"The Court: No; that is a matter for the court.

"Mr. Shreve: And we submit to the court that the child is incompetent to testify under the section of the Code of Civil Procedure.

"The Court: Swear him. Can you stand up? (The usual oath was then repeated to the witness by the clerk.)

"Mr. Shreve: Let the record show that the child stands mute, please.

"Q. By the Court: Do you promise that what you will tell here in answer to questions that are asked you shall be the truth? A. (the witness). M'h'm."

[1] If the learned trial judge erred in holding that the child was competent to testify as a witness in the case, it was because he not only refused defendant's counsel the privilege of examining the boy on his voir dire, but so circumscribed his own examination that he failed to bring out any fact tending to show the strength of the child's memory or ability accurately to recall past occurrences. The child's extreme youthfulness was not, per se, sufficient to exclude him from the witness stand. There is no arbitrary age limit under which the testimony of a child is automatically rejected. It was held in Brazier's Case, 1 East, P. C. 443, 1 Leach, C. C. 199, upon consideration by 12 judges, that there is no determinate age at which the testimony of a child might be admitted or rejected. Under that decision a child only 5 years of age was held a competent witness. The requirement of our statute is not one of age, but of understanding. A witness who has reached the age of 10 years is presumed, prima facie, to be competent. If below that age, he still is competent to testify unless it is made to "appear" to the trial judge that the child is "incapable of receiving just impressions of the facts" respecting which he is to be examined, or that he is incapable of relating the facts truly. People v. Dunlop, 27 Cal. App. 464, 465, 150 Pac. 389; People v. Swist, 136 Cal. 522, 523, 69 Pac. 223.

[2] If the child is under 10 years of age, and his competency to testify is, for that reason, challenged, the strength of his mental faculties and his power to understand and appreciate his moral duty to speak the truth is to be determined by an inquiry the purpose of which is to advise the trial judge. The intelligence of the child is to be determined not alone from his answers to the questions propounded to him, but, to a large extent, from his appearance and conduct while in the presence of the court.

[3] Because the trial judge has an opportunity to observe the child and listen to his manner of answering questions, the question as to competency rests peculiarly in his discretion. To so great a degree does it rest in the trial judge's discretion that it has been said that "in most cases, it would hardly be one which could be reviewed." People v. Dunlop, supra. It is only when there has been a clear abuse of discretion or a manifest misapprehension of some legal principle that the trial judge's decision will be reversed.

[4] Appellant's argument against the admissibility of the testimony of any child as young as was this boy is based upon the assumption that it is essential that it should be made to appear, not only that the child understands the nature and force of an oath, but that his sense of the obligatory force of an oath is rooted in sanctions of a religious character. This may have been the rule at common law and under the statutes of some states. Such, however, is not now the rule under the Constitution and statutes of this state. All that our Code requires is that it shall appear to the trial judge that the child's mentality is such that he is capable of receiving just impressions of the facts concerning which he is to testify and of relating them truly.

It was said by Mr. Justice Harrison in the Matter of Johnson, 98 Cal. 549, 33 Pac. 460, 21 L. R. A. 380, by way of obiter, it is true that the rule which formerly obtained in England that, as the child could not be examined except under oath, its evidence was excluded unless it understood the nature of an oath, does not obtain in this state. But even if it be necessary to show that the child understands the nature of the oath that may be administered to him if he shall become a witness, nevertheless it is not necessary to show that he entertains any particular theological belief, such, for example, as a belief in a Supreme Being who punishes the wrongdoer here or hereafter. No person, child or adult, may be excluded from the witness stand on account of his opinions on matters of religious belief. Const. art. 1, § 4; Code Civ. Proc. § 1879. It is enough that the child possesses a sense of moral responsibility.

In the instant case, so far as the child's sense of moral responsibility is concerned, it was enough that his mother, as the boy told the trial judge, had taught him to tell the truth, and that he thought that little boys who do not tell the truth would be punished by being put in jail. Without doubt, he had no comprehensive conception of the nature of that kind of punishment; but it is sufficient that he understood that some, even if unknown, evil would befall him should he depart from the truth. A child who understands that he will be punished on earth is competent, although he know nothing of punishment after death. Sancedo v. State (Tex. Cr. App.) 69 S. W. 142; Bright v. Commonwealth, 120 Ky. 298, 86 S. W. 527, 117 Am. St. Rep. 590. As said by Mr. Wigmore:

"A child's inclination to tell the truth or the opposite is apt to be more a matter of instinct and of previous training and surroundings than of a conscious reflection upon the prospects of a future state." 3 Wigmore on Ev. pp. 2358, 2359.

For these reasons we think that, to qualify a child under 10 years of age upon the score of his moral responsibility, it is sufficient that he understands that it is his duty to tell the truth, and that he will somehow be punished if he does not. The rule is thus stated in Cyc.:

"It is held sufficient to qualify the child that he understands the difference between truth and falsehood, and his duty to tell the truth, and that he will be punished if he testifies falsely, although he does not understand the legal nature of an oath or appreciate the formality of taking it, as, from a legal standpoint, one who has an adequate sense of the impropriety of falsehood understands the nature of an oath, although not able to define it." 40 Cyc. 2204.

Appellant cites the case of State v. Michael, 37 W. Va. 565, 16 S. E. 803, 19 L. R. A. 605. There the court proceeded upon the theory that the effect of an oath on the conscience of the child should arise from religious sentiments of a permanent nature. This, as we have seen, is contrary to the Constitution and statutes of this state. With us, as we have said, intelligence, and not belief, is the true test. The constitutional guaranty that no person shall be rendered incompetent to be a witness "on account of his opinions on matters of religious belief" would be violated if adults were held to have civil capacity to testify in a court of justice, though entertaining no belief in a Supreme Being or a future state of rewards and punishments, and the privilege denied to a child possessing no opinion conforming to some prescribed theological belief. "Free governments deal with the acts of the citizen, and not with his thoughts."

[5] Where, as here, the child is examined on his voir dire, before being sworn as a witness, and after his capacity to testify has been directly challenged by one of the parties, his capacity is not to be questioned by the jury after the trial judge has ruled against the objection thereto. The jurors, as triers of the credibility and persuasive sufficiency of all evidence, which is admitted for their consideration, may pass upon the weight to be given to the child's evidence, and, if they conclude that it is inherently improbable, may disbelieve it; but, the judge having determined the capacity of the witness by applying the rules of law to the facts found by himself, the witness stands before the jury untrammeled by any question as to his qualification. If, therefore, they reject his testimony, it should be merely because, all things considered, they do not believe him, and not because they find him lacking by force of the law's definition of his competency. With his competency the jury has nothing to do. Wigmore on Ev. vol. 1, §§ 486, 487; Id. vol. 4, § 2550.

We come now to the most difficult aspect of the question here presented—the exceedingly limited nature of the trial judge's examination of the boy and his peremptory refusal to permit appellant's counsel to ask any question while the boy was being examined on his voir dire for the purpose of adducing answers that might shed light upon his competency, i. e., his ability to receive just impressions of the facts respecting which he was expected to testify and to relate them truly. We purposely have given a somewhat extended consideration of the general principles applicable to the determination of a child's capacity to testify, in order to show, not only the wide latitude of discretion with which the trial judge is vested when passing upon the competency of a child witness, but the effect that an abuse of that discretion may have on the rights of the party objecting to the child's competency.

The author of this opinion is not prepared to say that, in all cases, counsel for the objecting party may examine the child on its voir dire as a matter of strict legal right.

"The mode of eliciting and determining by examination the fact of competency is left to the sound discretion of the judge." Williams v. State, 12 Tex. App. 137.

Mr Wharton says:

"The preliminary examination thus requisite is usually undertaken exclusively by the court, and it is said that it will require a strong case to sustain a reversal of the ruling of the court examining such a witness." Wharton on Ev. § 368.

See the reference to Brazier's Case in People v. Bernal, 10 Cal. 67. In Carter v. State, 63 Ala. 52, 35 Am. Rep. 4, it was said that—"When * * * a child of tender years is produced as a witness, it is the duty of the presiding judge to examine him or her, without the interference of counsel further than the judge may choose to allow, in regard to the obligations of the witness' oath."

Mr. Wigmore says:

"In this inquiry, on the one hand, the judge is not bound by the ordinary rules of evidence applicable to evidence offered to the jury; and, in particular, he need not permit cross-examination of witnesses called to prove or disprove another's qualifications." Wigmore on Ev. vol. 1, § 487.

But this same eminent law writer, in a later section (vol. 3, § 1820) says:

"The examination of a child, however, is made usually by the judge; though either counsel has of course the right to supplement it by questions tending to bring out whatever may be in favor of his contention." (Italics ours.)

And in a footnote on page 2355 appears the following:

"In Hughes v. R. Co., 65 Mich. 10, it was said that the trial court must himself make the examination, and not leave it to counsel; but this seems unsound." (Italics ours.)

[6] Without undertaking to decide whether the objecting party may in all cases, and as a matter of strict legal right, supplement the trial judge's examination with questions of his own, we are satisfied that in the instant case the refusal to permit defendant's counsel to question the boy on his voir dire was clearly an abuse of discretion, so prejudicial to appellant that a reversal must ensue. It may well be that if the examination as conducted by the trial court had taken a wider range, as it should, its decision of the matter would have been final, even though defendant's counsel were denied the right to propound questions to the boy on the voir dire.

The restricted examination conducted by the court was limited to such narrow confines that it barely sufficed to develop the following: In reply to the court's questions, the boy gave his name and age, stated that he had been in court before (referring, we assume, to the preliminary examination before the justice of the peace); that he attended Sunday school; that he lived with his mother, who, he said, had taught him to tell the truth, and that he thought that boys who do not tell the truth would be put in jail. This is practically all that was developed by the court's examination, except the further fact that the child seemingly failed to grasp the purport of some of the judge's questions. While it doubtless was not necessary to interrogate the child respecting the specific facts as to which he was later to be called to testify, we think that a due regard for the rights of the accused demanded either that the court's examination should have covered a wider range or that counsel should have been permitted to put to the boy such questions as might further develop his ability to relate truly the facts respecting which he was called to give evidence. The acts as to which he was expected to testify were of such a character that the author of this opinion inclines to the view that the trial judge, from the boy's apparent age and his general appearance while being examined on his voir dire, was justified in assuming that, if the acts were committed as charged against defendant, the boy was capable, at the time of their commission, of receiving just and accurate mental impressions of the facts. And the author of this opinion is inclined to the view that the facts developed by the trial judge's examination justified the conclusion that, in so far as the boy still retained true mental pictures of what had occurred, unaffected by the suggestions of others, he would endeavor honestly to relate all that he remembered.

But the Code's test of qualification requires something more than a truthful disposition and the ability to receive just mental impressions of objective facts. The requirement that the child shall be able to truly relate the impressions that he may have received implies, not alone a truth-telling disposition, but a memory sufficiently strong and retentive to be able to recollect faithfully the objective facts or the mental impressions originally created thereby. There is nothing in the trial court's examination that tends to disclose the strength or weakness of the child's power of recollection. The trial was had three and a half months after the occurrences that led to the filing of the information against appellant. Meanwhile the boy undoubtedly had heard his parents talk about the case and its distressing facts. The force of suggestion, always strong, is particularly potent with the impressionable and plastic mind of childhood. We have no reason to believe that either parent consciously and willfully intended to influence the child's testimony. But without intending any such result, the repetition of supposed facts in the presence of a child often creates a mental impression or concept that has no objective reality in any actually existing fact. Before being permitted to testify as a witness in the case, the child should have been asked some question or questions having a tendency to disclose the strength or weakness of his recollection—his ability to retain, for three months or more, and uninfluenced by the unconscious effect of suggestion, a clear and distinct mental picture of what happened at the time when, it is claimed, he and the defendant were together. Such line of questioning was neither pursued by the court nor permitted to counsel.

That such questioning would probably have made manifest the boy's inability accurately to recall and thus relate, at the date of the trial, exactly what did happen three and a half months previously, is, we think, sufficiently disclosed by what occurred after the child was sworn as a witness in the case. Not only did the boy, on cross-examination, testify that he had been told by his mother to say that defendant had done certain things, but his testimony before the committing magistrate, given only 10 days after the alleged crime, and offered in evidence to impeach his testimony in the superior court, leads to the conclusion either that his testimony before the committing magistrate was false or that his power of recollection was so weak that, when examined as a witness in the superior court, he no longer retained any independent recollection of what had happened. The record here shows that the following occurred on the examination of the child before the committing magistrate:

"The Court: * * * Q. Do you know this man sitting over there? (Indicating the defendant.) A. Yes, sir.

"Q. Did that man ever do anything to you? A. What is your name?

"Q. Did this man ever do anything to you? A. That man; no.

"Q. He didn't ever do anything to you? A. No.

"The Court: Now, look at that man over there; do you know him now? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. What did he do to you?

"By the Mother: Tell him the truth.

"The Court: Q. What did this man do to you—anything? A. No.

"Q. Didn't he do anything to you? A. No.

"Q. Do you know that man over there? A. Yes, sir.

"Q. What is his name? A. I don't know what his name is.

"Q. You don't know what his name is? A. No.

"Q. And you say he never did anything to you? A. No.

"Q. Do you want to walk over there and take a look at him? Come on, you and I, and we will walk over there; that is a good boy. (The court and witness approach the defendant.) Now, then, is this the man; do you know him? A. No.

"Q. Did this man ever do anything to you? A. No, sir.

"Q. * * * Do you know this man? A. No.

"Q. (by Mr. Fitts). Did you ever see him before? A. No.

"The Court: Did he ever do anything to you? A. No."

Then, after an interval during which several questions were asked which have no bearing on the case:

"Q. * * * I want you to look at this man again and tell me if he ever did anything to you? A. Yes.

"Q. When did you see him? Do you know when you saw this man before? A. In the garage.

"Q. By Mr. Fitts: What happened in the garage? What took place there? A. He didn't do anything in there.

"Q. Did he do anything at any place? A. No."

The conclusion arrived at by the author of this opinion is that the trial court's examination of the boy on his voir dire was restricted to such a narrow and limited compass that to deny appellant's counsel the privilege of supplementing the court's examination with questions of his own was, under all the circumstances of this case, an abuse of discretion, and therefore error. And since without the boy's testimony the evidence does not warrant a conviction, the error was prejudicial, and a reversal is necessary.

In holding that, under the circumstances of this case, it was error to deny defendant the privilege of examining the boy on his voir dire, I do not wish to be understood as holding that either party to an action, always, in every case, and as a matter of strict legal right, may supplement the court's examination of the child. What I do hold is that the court, by its own examination of a child on his voir dire, should adduce some fact or facts tending to show that the child's memory is strong enough to enable him to recall such facts as those respecting which he is to testify solely by reason of his own independent power of recollection, or else the privilege of showing the possession or lack of such power of recollection should be accorded counsel. Lacking the ability accurately to recollect past occurrences, the child, though he may have received, at the time of their occurrence, just impressions of the facts respecting which he is called to testify, is not capable of "relating them truly."

Judgment and order reversed.

WORKS, J. I concur in the judgment of reversal, and in the reasoning upon which the Presiding Justice concludes that a reversal should result; but, as the question before us is one of great importance, I deem it proper to point out other reasons which, in my opinion, show that the trial judge abused the discretion confided to him under the law regulating the competency of children of tender years to testify.

[7] It is to be observed that, under the terms of subdivision 2, § 1880, Code of Civil Procedure, there are two separate tests for a determination of the question whether children under 10 years of age may be witnesses. They cannot testify if it appears, first, that they are incapable of receiving just impressions of the facts respecting which they are examined; second, that they are incapable of relating those facts truly. It is worthy of remark, however, that each of these tests must be satisfied through a medium which is akin to one of them; that is, through the ability of the child to narrate, considering also such physical manifestations as may accompany narration, gestures, play of features, and the other indicia which will always aid in determining mental dullness or alertness. It is the existence of these latter phenomena which principally gives rise to the rule that the competency of children to be witnesses is to be left to the discretion of the trial judge; a rule founded, manifestly, upon sense, and one which, it must be conceded, renders it difficult for a court of review to say, in a given case, that the discretion has been abused.

[8] It is to be noted also that, while both tests are to be ascertained through an identical medium, they relate to different periods of time: The first, to the date of the occurrences which are under inquiry, for it is then that "just impressions" are to be received; the second, to the date upon which the child is offered as a witness, for it is then that the capacity for "relating truly" is to be ascertained. Therefore, if a given child shall have made narration of the facts of an occurrence at a time less remote from the time of their happening than is the date of the trial, that narration would be expected better to indicate whether he had received a just impression of the occurrences than would his narration, or his examination on his voir dire, at the trial. On the other hand his examination at the trial would furnish the guide for determination of the ability truly to relate, provided that a comparison of that examination with the earlier narration would furnish a proper aid to the ascertainment of that test. It is to be remembered that such a comparison is to be made by the court, for the purpose of determining whether the child is competent to be a witness, thus presenting a very different question from the one requiring the jury to determine, by comparison, whether statements made in an earlier narration are so variant from his testimony, after he has become a witness, as to make that testimony unworthy of credence.

Taking these principles as a just basis upon which to proceed, if they constitute such a basis, what is the situation in the instant case? The preliminary examination of appellant was held 10 days after the alleged occurrences from which sprang the charge against him, and the testimony of the child on that examination, set forth in the opinion of the presiding justice, was offered for the purpose of impeaching him as a witness. Aside from that purpose, however, it should have been valuable to the court as solving the question whether the boy was competent as a witness, upon the score of his incapacity, 10 days before, to receive a "just impression" of the occurrences of the day, if there were any in which appellant was concerned. Conceding to the trial judge the advantage possessed by him of observing the child, his gestures, his manner, and his expression, it appears to me that his statements made to the magistrate demonstrate that he was disqualified as a witness under the first test provided by the statute. Considering the nature of his answers, it makes no difference what was his demeanor before the trial judge during his examination on his voir dire more than three months later. It is manifest to me that his answers before the magistrate show that his mind was incapable of receiving a just impression of anything that occurred between him and appellant, whatever may have been the nature of the occurrence. He was questioned and requestioned, and questioned yet further, and nothing came of it. He was asked 10 times, in slightly variant forms, whether appellant had ever done anything to him. The first time he answered with a question to the magistrate, "What is your name?" At all other times, up to and including the eighth, he answered, "No." The ninth time he answered "Yes," and the tenth he returned again to, "No." Immediately after he answered "Yes," to the ninth putting of the question, the following transpired:

"By the Court: Q. When did you see him? Do you know when you saw this man before? A. In the garage.

"Q. By Mr. Fitts: What happened in the garage? What took place there? A. He didn't do anything in there."

The tenth putting of the question already mentioned then came in this form: "Did he do anything at any place?" The answer, as already stated, was, "No." The child was asked five times if he knew appellant. The first three times he answered yes. The fourth putting of the question with its answer, are thus shown:

"Q. Do you want to walk over there and take a look at him? Come on, you and I, and we will walk over there; that is a good boy. (The court and witness approach the defendant.) Now, then, is this the man; do you know him? A. No."

To the fifth statement of the question he also answered, "No." Mr. Fitts then put a kindred question: "Did you ever see him before?" The boy answered "No."

Upon this evidence it is to be wondered how the committing magistrate ever bound appellant over, as the other evidence at the trial was very slight, and of no value whatever without the testimony of the child, and that testimony alone must have been taken to establish the corpus delicti. But with the action of the justice of the peace we have nothing to do; and I reiterate the statement that the answers of the boy at the preliminary examination show that he was not qualified as a witness under the first test imposed by the statute.

In developing my views upon the subject of the second test it is necessary to state a few words of the boy's testimony at the trial. He says that appellant unbuttoned one button of his clothes and that "he sucked on my hand." This rather cryptic expression is explained by the testimony of the child's father to the effect that the child had been taught to employ the word "hand" in referring to the male organ of generation. The boy also testified that the crime was committed in a garage; and the circumstance is mentioned, with the reminder that he was questioned at the preliminary examination as to what happened in a garage, for the purpose of indicating that on both occasions he had the same event and the same place in mind. A comparison of the two narratives will indicate an amazing difference between them. The variance cannot be accounted for upon the theory that the child's powers of narration had so surprisingly increased during the three months and a half which elapsed between the two events. To what, then, was the change owing? We have the key in certain of the observations of the presiding justice. He says:

"Meanwhile the boy undoubtedly heard his parents talk about the case and its distressing facts. The force of suggestion, always strong, is particularly potent with the impressionable and plastic mind of childhood. * * * The repetition of supposed facts in the presence of a child often creates a mental impression or concept that has no objective reality in any actually existing fact."

The great change in the child's story and in his manner of telling it must have been occasioned through the process thus so graphically described. At the preliminary examination the boy had no story. A quarter of a year later he has one so fully developed that it serves to establish the corpus delicti and to fasten a conviction upon the appellant.

[9] The second test prescribed by the statute must contemplate that a child's ability truly "to relate" is to depend upon his natural power of narration, exercised through his unprompted relation of facts as to which he has previously acquired a "just impression," and not upon a factitious ability to recite what he may have heard, with frequent repetition, from others, whether their utterances were spoken with design or in complete innocence; and there is no reason to suppose that anything apart from the latter was the case in the present instance.

Conceding that the child was at all times honest, if the idea of dishonesty, in the strict sense, can be thought of in contemplating a child of such tender years in connection with such a matter; conceding that he told the truth on both occasions, as he understood truth (and there appears no reason to assert the contrary); conceding that the testimony before the magistrate did not impeach the witness—conceding all these things, it is impossible to understand how the child could answer as he did before the magistrate, could then answer as he did at the trial, and yet be said to meet the second requirement of the statute. It seems manifest, to me, at least, that he was incapable, at the time of the trial, of truly relating the facts making up an occurrence of three and a half months earlier.

[10] What is said above proceeds upon the theory that it is the duty of a judge, at any time after he has determined that a child is competent as a witness, to change his mind upon due occasion, remove the child from the witness stand, and instruct the jury to disregard his testimony. It requires no argument to convince that this must be the rule. The trial judge should have taken that course upon the presentation of the child's testimony given at the preliminary examination.

I concur: CRAIG, J.

BURR v. CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO. (S. F. 9470.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 26, 1921. Rehearing Denied Aug. 25, 1921.)

1. Municipal corporations ⟸969(3) — Recital as to necessity or emergency in tax ordinance not conclusive so as to warrant increase in rate.

Recital of facts in ordinance to show necessity or emergency is not conclusive of the truth of the recital or existence of such facts so as to warrant increase in tax rate, under San Francisco Charter, art. 3, c. 1, §§ 11, 13.

2. Municipal corporations ⟸957(3) — Statement of increase in expenses in tax ordinance held not to show "great necessity or emergency."

A statement in an ordinance that the expenses of the city had increased to such an extent that they could not be kept up without exceeding the dollar limit did not show "great necessity or emergency" within the meaning of San Francisco City Charter, art. 3, c. 1, §§ 11, 13, authorizing increases in taxes only in case of any great necessity or emergency.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by E. W. Burr, as executor of the last will of C. C. Burr, deceased, against the City and County of San Francisco. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Drown, Leicester & Drown, of San Francisco, for appellant.

George Lull and Maurice T. Dooling, Jr., both of San Francisco, for respondent.

SHAW, J. In the court below judgment was given in favor of the defendant, from which the plaintiff appeals.

The object of the plaintiff's action was to recover of the city and county of San Francisco the sum of $462.60 paid as taxes upon the property of the plaintiff's testator for the year 1914 under protest, which tax, it is alleged, was unlawfully levied by the city, in violation of the provisions of section 11, chapter 1, of article 3 of the city charter, limiting the annual tax rate to $1 on each $100 of the assessed valuation of property.

Section 11 aforesaid provides that, exclusive of certain special taxes, the tax levy for any year "shall not exceed the rate of one dollar on each one hundred dollars valuation of the property assessed." This provision is qualified by a provision of section 13 of the same chapter, which at the time of the said tax levy read as follows:

"The limitation in section eleven of this charter upon the rate of taxation shall not apply in case of any great necessity or emergency. In such case the limitation may be temporarily suspended so as to enable the supervisors to provide for such necessity or emergency. No increase shall be made in the rate of taxation authorized to be levied in any fiscal year, unless such increase be authorized by ordinance passed by the unanimous vote of the supervisors and approved by the mayor. The character of such necessity or emergency shall be recited in the ordinance authorizing such action, and be entered in the journal of the board." Stats. 1899, p. 261.

The levy in question was made under an ordinance adopted by the supervisors of the city on June 29, 1914, for the purpose of meeting the requirements of the aforesaid provision of section 13 regarding taxation in the case of great necessity or emergency. The recital of the facts showing the great necessity and emergency in the ordinance was as follows:

"Section 1. It is hereby recited, determined and declared that a great necessity and emergency exists within the city and county of San Francisco, which requires that the limitation of taxation contained in section 11 of chapter 1, of article 3 of the charter of said city and county, be temporarily suspended, and that the character of such necessity and emergency is as follows, to wit:

"That on the 18th day of April, 1906, and days following, a fire destroyed a vast amount of the taxable property within the city of the approximate value of $150,000,000.00.

"That the assessment roll for the year 1905–06 aggregated $525,000,000.00; that the value of taxable property, shown by the last assessment roll was but slightly in excess of that sum and the estimated value of taxable property for the ensuing fiscal year will not exceed $540,000,000.00; that said fire checked the normal increase of said assessment roll, and its restoration to the former amount has been extremely slow and difficult and at a less ratio than has been the increase of necessary governmental expenses; that in addition to the loss of taxable property aforesaid the adoption of Senate Constitutional Amendment No. 1 by the voters on November 8, 1910, still further reduced the amount of taxable property of said city and county by approximately $97,000,000.00, and at the same time deprived the city of certain license tax revenues amounting to a large sum; furthermore, by amendments made to the charter in 1907, the salaries in the police and fire departments were increased by the amount of more than $1,000,000.00; also that by charter amendment adopted November 15, 1910, additional expenses were added to the expenses of the city in the aggregate of approximately $100,000.00; that at the several sessions of the Legislature since 1905, including the session of 1913, large additional expenses and financial burdens were laid upon the county of San Francisco, including the expenditures on account of the so-called 'Mothers' Pension Act', the so-called 'Employers' Compensation Act' and 'Tenement House Act,' which expenses and burdens could not be anticipated and provided for under the provisions of the charter of said city and county when adopted in 1898; that furthermore, the Legislature by various enactments, has materially reduced the sums heretofore received by the state in support of the public school system, which reductions could not be foreseen and provided for at the time of the adoption of said charter; that industrial, financial and economic conditions existing throughout the country have resulted in a rapid advance in the prices of commodities and of labor and such advance has been proportionately greater than the value of property subject to taxation; that the necessity of meeting such advanced costs is urgent and imperative and is beyond the power of the city and county and its officers to control; that the city and county of San Francisco faces a certain and unexpected shortage of funds, and that it will be impossible to conduct the government of the city and county and meet its essential expenses unless the limitations prescribed in chapter 1 of article 3 of the charter be temporarily suspended.

"That the demand due to the rapid growth of the city, particularly in new districts of the city and county, developed as a result of shifting of population caused by the fire aforesaid, for additional public institutions, services and necessities have been great, which demands and necessities could not be reasonably foreseen; that the revenue of the city and county from licenses has decreased by approximately the sum of $250,000.00 since 1908–09.

"That the estimated and necessary expenditures of the city and county of San Francisco for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, will be $14,900,000, of which sum approximately $3,600,000 must be raised in excess of the limitation contained in the charter.

"That a great necessity or emergency exists for the suspension of the limitation in section 11 of chapter 1 of article 3 upon the rate of taxation, because of the inadequacy of a tax of $1.00 on each $100.00 upon the assessed valuation of property in the city and county of San Francisco arising from the conditions, acts, happenings and things above recited, and such limitation is hereby suspended for the purpose of providing for such emergency and necessity."

Section 2 of the ordinance declared that a tax was levied of $66^4/_{10}$ cents upon each $100 of assessed valuation of property within the city, and that said tax should be "an increase of and an addition to the rate of one dollar taxation on each one hundred dollars of assessed valuation" and "an addition to and increase of all taxes of every amount and kind authorized to be levied under and by virtue" of section 11 aforesaid.

The claim of the plaintiff is that the recital of facts set forth in this ordinance to show a great necessity or emergency are insufficient for that purpose, and do not come within the meaning and effect of the aforesaid section 13, and, consequently, that the increase in the tax rate made by said ordinance is wholly void. This presents the only question for consideration in the case.

[1, 2] At the outset it is to be noted that section 13 aforesaid does not authorize a tax exceeding the dollar limit whenever the board of supervisors shall by ordinance declare that a great necessity or emergency exists, but that it authorizes such increased tax only "in case of any great necessity or emergency"; that is, when a great necessity or emergency does, in fact, then exist. The consequence is that the recital of facts in the ordinance to show such necessity or emergency is not conclusive of the truth of the recital or of the existence of such facts. This was expressly decided in San Christina, etc., Co. v. San Francisco, 167 Cal. 772, 141 Pac. 384, 52 L. R. A. (N. S.) 676. It must follow, also, that the conclusion or declaration of the board that the great necessity or emergency did exist because of the facts recited is not conclusive. Both the existence of the recited facts and the conclusion drawn therefrom may be disputed by the taxpayer and, on review by the courts, held to be nonexistent, or unwarrantable, respectively.

In the above-cited case, the San Francisco tax levy of 1910 in excess of the dollar limit was attacked. The ordinance levying that tax declared that a great necessity and emergency existed in 1910, because of the destruction of and damage to public property, building, streets, and sewers by the great fire and earthquake in April, 1906, which the city had found it impossible to reconstruct, replace, or repair in the meantime out of its revenues appropriated to that purpose, and because of danger that the bubonic plague prevalent in 1907 might recur and the necessity of provision to prevent such recurrence. This was held to be insufficient to constitute a "great necessity or emergency" existing in 1910. The court there said:

"It was not in contemplation that the supervisors could foster and nurse such emergency so as to spread their taxing power over an indeterminate number of years. As little was it designed that under the head of emergency or necessity should be imposed taxes not bearing forcefully and directly on the relief, cure or prevention of the emergency or necessity."

Also that—

Where such a tax ordinance is attacked, the "court will scrutinize the items presented: First, to determine whether or not the great emergency or necessity, within the meaning of the charter, existed at the time of the levy; and, second, whether, if it be found that such emergency or necessity did in fact exist, any of the items in the levy do not fairly come within the purport and scope of such emergency levy."

It necessarily follows that a great necessity or emergency requiring the raising of money to rebuild a city hall, for example, would not uphold an additional tax to raise money to repair streets and sewers or to rebuild a county hospital. Webster's definition of the word "emergency" as:

"An unforeseen combination of circumstances which calls for an immediate action or remedy; pressing necessity, exigency"

—is approved and followed in that opinion, and the phrase "great necessity or emergency" is treated on the theory that the adjective "great" applies to both words. See, also, People v. Lee Wah, 71 Cal. 80, 11 Pac. 851.

Counsel for the city virtually concede that no one of the particular facts recited in the ordinance is of itself sufficient to show either a great necessity or a great emergency. They rest their case on the proposition that the facts recited, taken together, showed that the performance of the ordinary functions of the city government for the fiscal year 1914–1915 required the expenditure of a larger amount of money than could have been raised by a tax rate of $1 on the $100, and that this constitutes a sufficient "great necessity" to come within the meaning of the charter provision in question. They say:

"If it will be admitted by counsel for appellant that in every municipality there is a minimum of expenditures which must necessarily be made if the municipality is to serve its normal and essential functions, then it seems impossible to escape the conclusion that if for some reason the value of the taxable property decrease, or the necessary expenditures increase, or both, that there exists a great necessity—indeed, an overpowering one—for increasing the rate of taxation."

With respect to the particular case they proceed to say:

"It will serve no useful purpose to go in detail into the various facts recited in the ordinance which show (1) a decrease in income and (2) an increase in necessary expenditures. If we are correct in our contention that when the city and county cannot perform all of its necessary functions within the dollar limit a great necessity exists for its suspension, it follows that the facts recited which have brought about this state of affairs are not themselves great necessities or emergencies. They are only the various contributing factors which, taken all together and viewed as a whole, have made it impossible for the city properly to perform all its duties within the dollar limit. The great necessity lies in the fact that the city can no longer properly function within the dollar limit. The contributing facts recited in the ordinance simply characterize this great necessity."

Their claim, in effect, is that the final recital of the ordinance to the effect that the estimated expenditures of the city for the year ending June 30, 1915, will be $14,900,000, "of which sum approximately $3,600,000 must be raised in excess of the limitation contained in the charter," is alone sufficient to show the great necessity for the increased tax, and that the preceding recitals are mere evidentiary facts which establish the ultimate fact.

If this is the meaning of section 13, then it practically destroys the dollar limit. If the growth of the city, or changes in the charter, or in the state law, or the entering upon new activities by the city government, or other changes which are always to be expected in a growing community, require the creation of new offices, bureaus, or commissions and the hiring of more employees, and result in large additions to the regular yearly running expenses of the city, and there is no corresponding increase in the tax valuation, and these things are sufficient to create the "great necessity" in mind when the charter was adopted in 1899, then of course, they will continue to operate every year and the dollar limit ceases to exist. It reduces the meaning of the charter provisions on the subject to a mere statement that such tax shall not exceed the dollar rate, except in cases where that rate will not raise the expenses of the city, in which event the rate will be unlimited. The charter may as well have provided that such taxes should not exceed the dollar limit, unless a higher rate was necessary to raise the money required to pay the regular annual expenses of the city. The temporary suspension authorized to "enable the supervisors to provide for such necessity or emergency" would immediately become regular and permanent. The restriction to the dollar limit, which was intended to compel reasonable economy, would have no effect of that kind whatever. All that the supervisors need do to circumvent the provision would be to create a necessity by their own extravagance or by engaging in new municipal activities and enterprises, benevolent or otherwise, and the power to levy the increased rate would automatically follow.

We think the charter makers did not intend that the dollar limit should be so ineffectual and useless. We can perceive no essential difference between the conditions shown by the ordinance aforesaid and those shown by the ordinance under consideration in San Christina v. San Francisco, supra, which also declared that the facts recited constituted a "great necessity and emergency," as does the present one, and which the court held insufficient to show either. The ordinance, in this view of the case, amounts simply to a statement that the expenses of the city have increased to such an extent that they cannot be kept up without exceeding the dollar limit. This, in our opinion, does not come within the letter or spirit of the term "great necessity or emergency."

It may be observed that the city authorities themselves seem to have been somewhat doubtful on the subject, for early in the year 1915 the supervisors proposed an amendment of section 13 aforesaid to the voters, and called an election at which it was adopted, whereby nearly all the matters stated in the ordinance were excepted from the operation of the dollar limit of section 11, and it is no longer of much practical effect.

It follows from what we have said that the court below erred in holding that a great necessity or emergency was shown by the tax ordinance.

The judgment is reversed.

JOSE et al. v. UTLEY, Dist. Atty.
(L. A. 6355.)

(Supreme Court of California. May 13, 1921.)

1. Mines and minerals ⊂=36—Location of oil lands in absence of discovery merely authorize possession and development.

In the absence of discovery of oil, the location of mineral lands under the laws of the United States merely authorizes the locators to maintain possession while diligently and in good faith prosecuting the work of endeavoring to discover minerals thereon.

2. Corporations ⊂=144—Purchasers for less than par liable to company for difference between value of property conveyed to corporation for stock and amount of stock issued therefor.

Purchasers of corporate stock, par value $1, for only 10 cents, as fully paid up, if aware of the initial transaction whereby certain unproved oil lands were conveyed to the company for the stock, would be liable to the corporation for the difference between the value of the property conveyed to it for the stock and the amount of stock issued therefor pro rata.

3. Licenses ⊂=18½, New, vol. 12A Key-No. Series—Issuance of capital stock held fraudulent to creditors and stockholders on account of excessive valuation placed on property acquired by company.

In suit to enjoin the district attorney of a county from prosecuting plaintiffs' underwriter or broker for violating the Corporate Securities Law, popularly known as the Blue Sky Law, complaint held to show that the issuance of the capital stock of the corporation involved was fraudulent as against creditors and stockholders because of the excessive valuation placed on the property, claimed but unproved oil lands located under the laws of the United States, acquired by the corporation.

4. Equity ⟸65(2)—Equity will not aid fraudulent corporate transactions by enjoining district attorney from prosecuting for violation of Blue Sky Law.

In view of the fraudulent nature of the corporate transactions involved, equity will not aid plaintiffs seeking injunction against the district attorney for a county from prosecuting plaintiffs' underwriter or broker for violation of the Corporate Securities Law, popularly known as the Blue Sky Law, even if the law attacked is unconstitutional and the threatened action of the district attorney erroneous.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; T. L. Lewis, Judge.

Suit by John A. Jose, Jr., and others against H. S. Utley, District Attorney for San Diego county, Cal. From Judgment denying injunction, plaintiffs appeal. Affirmed.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., Leon French, Deputy Atty. Gen., and H. S. Utley, Dist. Atty., and E. S. Lovett, Asst. Dist. Atty., both of San Diego, and H. L. Carnahan, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

WILBUR, J. This action was brought by the plaintiffs to enjoin the defendant from prosecuting Margaret Truax for violating the Corporate Securities Law (Stats. 1917, p. 673; 1919 p. 231), popularly known as the "Blue Sky Law." Margaret Truax is engaged in selling 1,000,000 shares of corporate stock in the Imperial Pacific Oil, Gas & Refining Company, a corporation. Plaintiffs claim that the Corporate Securities Act is unconstitutional for various reasons, and that the threatened action of the district attorney should be restrained. A demurrer was interposed to the complaint, was sustained, and judgment thereupon rendered in favor of the defendant, from which the plaintiffs appeal.

In order to understand appellants' contention, it will be necessary to state some of the facts alleged in the complaint. Plaintiffs located placer oil mining claims upon 56 quarter sections of surveyed government land in the Imperial Valley, by posting and recording notices of location describing the property by quarter sections in each location notice. In addition to these locations it is alleged that some 250 associates of the plaintiffs have located additional land, amounting, together with the 56 sections, to a total of 32,520 acres. Plaintiffs organized the Imperial Pacific Oil, Gas & Refining Company under the laws of the state of Arizona for the purpose of conveying to such corporation the locations upon the 56 quarter sections (8,960 acres) of land out of the 35,520 acres in consideration of 2,496,000 shares of the capital stock, fully paid up and nonassessable, of the capital of $2,500,000, divided into 2,500,000 shares of stock of the par value of $1 per share. In pursuance of plaintiffs' plan, articles of incorporation were prepared and filed in the office of the Arizona corporate commission, February 12, 1919, wherein I. J. Lipsohn, F. S. Hess, and H. A. Waltz were named as directors, and also as president, vice president, and secretary and treasurer, respectively. The meeting of this board of directors, as appears by the minutes thereof, which are attached to the complaint as an exhibit, was held March 6, 1919, wherein it was announced that the secretary had received $4 for four shares—$1 from I. J. Lipsohn, $1 from F. S. Hess, and $2 from M. A. Waltz—in pursuance whereof four shares of stock were issued; one to I. J. Lipsohn, one to F. S. Hess, and two to M. A. Waltz. Thereupon the directors considered a proposal dated Los Angeles, Cal., February 10, 1919 (two days before the filing of the articles of incorporation), addressed to the board of directors of the corporation offering to sell to the corporation "for and in consideration of $2,496,000, consisting of 2,496,000 shares of the par value of $1 per share, the same to be issued fully paid up and nonassessable, and to be issued to such person or persons in such number of shares, at such time or times as we shall or may from time to time in writing demand, all our rights, claims, and interests in the following described property."

This proposal contains a description of oil claims upon only 16 quarter sections of land, amounting to 2,560 acres instead of 8,960 acres, as planned. Thereupon the board of directors accepted the proposition in a resolution reciting that "the property mentioned therein being worth, in the judgment of the directors, the sum of $2,496,000 in the capital stock of this corporation." The officers of the corporation were directed to complete the purchase from plaintiff of the four sections by the payment to plaintiffs or on their order of the sum of $2,496,000 in the capital stock of the corporation, which "said shares upon being issued and delivered shall thereby become and be fully paid and nonassessable, as provided by the articles of incorporation."

Immediately after the passage of this resolution accepting plaintiffs' offer, F. S. Hess resigned as director and vice president, and two of the plaintiffs, Walter C. Wibeck and Harry L. Hollingworth, were elected; one to fill the vacancy caused by the resignation of Hess, and the other to fill the vacancy due to the fact that the by-laws provided for four directors, three only being named in the articles of incorporation. On March 8th two of the plaintiffs, Walter C. Wibeck and Harry L. Hollingworth, met as directors of the corporation, accepted the resignation of I. J. Lipsohn and M. A. Waltz as directors, and elected two other of the plaintiffs, John A. Jose and James Howze, as directors of the corporation. The plaintiffs were thus in full control of the corporation, the dummy directors having resigned. The agreement to accept the location upon four sections of land in exchange for 2,496,000 shares of fully paid stock had not been consummated by the conveyance of the land or the issuance of the stock. On April 1, 1919, the directors, being four of the plaintiffs, consented in writing to the holding of a meeting of the board of directors of the corporation, and passed a resolution to make application to the Arizona corporation commission for permission to issue to the plaintiffs, or such persons as they might direct, 1,996,000 shares, fully paid up and nonassessable. An additional proposal was submitted by the plaintiffs for one transfer to the corporation of their interests in eight sections of land (5,120 acres) for the sum of $8. The resolution accepting this proposal recited that the interests of plaintiff therein was worth in excess of $8.

In the complaint the parties in interest, the plaintiffs and their associates, are referred to as of "limited financial ability." It is alleged that the formation of this corporation under the laws of Arizona was brought about "as being more liberal and less expensive and better suited to the limited financial ability of the parties in interest." and further:

"That these plaintiffs, and said service men, being unable, from their limited private resources, to provide the proper funds for development and expenses, and for the purpose of raising such funds with the least expense and delay from technical legal entanglements and obstructions, decided to pool 1,000,000 shares of their private stock, and to legally sell the same, or so much thereof as was necessary, and on safe and reasonable terms, to purchasers, so as to give the purchasers a fair chance in the benefits of a successful future development and rise in stock value; that from the proceeds of said sales there would be paid the necessary current expenses thereof, and that the balance would be spent in the development for oil on said 8,960 acres, for the benefit of all parties in interest."

It is alleged that said 1,000,000 shares of stock were to be transferred to a competent business trustee, experienced in methods of selling and having offices and appliances therefor, "and thereby avoid the necessity of incurring all these expenses for office rent, furniture, books, stationery, typewriters, clerks, and employees." In pursuance of this purpose, on July 10, 1919, plaintiffs entered into a written agreement with Margaret Truax, whereby they transferred to her 1,000,000 shares of stock in the corporation to create a fund for drilling purposes. This stock she was to sell at a price not less than 10 cents per share, receiving and holding the proceeds derived from such sale or sales up to 10 cents as a trust fund to be used for drilling and development purposes on the land of the Imperial Pacific Oil, Gas & Refining Company. She was to have as compensation for acting as trustee all such sum or sums of money as she might secure from the sale of said stock over and above 10 cents, to be full compensation for her services. The funds so derived for the corporation (which could not exceed $100,000), were to be paid out by her for the said drilling operations, which were to be conducted under the direction and supervision of the corporation, through its duly authorized officers.

It is further agreed that the trustee should not be responsible for the failure or mistakes in drilling of wells or developing the property.

Thereafter Margaret Truax sought to secure a broker's permit in accordance with the Corporate Securities Act, and before the issuance of said permit proceeded to advertise said stock for sale. Purchasers were required to sign the following:

"Imperial Pacific Oil, Gas & Refining Company.
"Application for Development Fund Stock.
"Notice.—Right is reserved to withdraw all offerings at any time without notice, or to reject any application, or to allot a less number of shares than applied for.
"To M. Truax, Trustee of 'Development Fund,' Imperial Pacific Oil, Gas & Refining Company:
"I herewith subscribe for and agree to take ——— shares of the stock being sold by you in trust for the benefit of the development fund of the Imperial Pacifc Oil, Gas & Refining Company, and agree to pay therefor the sum of ——— dollars.
"In making this application, I understand that the business of prospecting for oil is hazardous and that no guaranty is made me that oil will be discovered. With this understanding, I consequently relieve you from all claims for liability in the event oil is not discovered, and the money herein subscribed for development purposes lost. Said money is hereby contributed to said development fund as per your trust terms.
"Name, ———,
"Address, ———."

It is further alleged that the corporation commissioner refused to permit sales of said stock or advertisements therefor until the corporation should receive a permit for the original issue and sale of the stock by the corporation, claiming that said original issue was void under the Corporate Securities Act of California.

Plaintiffs allege that notwithstanding the alleged unconstitutionality of the Corporate Securities Act they endeavored to comply with the demands of the commissioner and made application to such commissioner, which application is set up in the complaint. Plaintiffs, owing to the expense of complying with the orders of the commissioner of corporations, as they allege, finally decided to ignore the orders of the commissioner, and on July 28, 1919, thereupon it is alleged, the commissioner directed the defendant, district attorney of San Diego county, to proceed to prosecute Margaret Truax and the San Diego newspapers for "publishing the advertisements relating to said oil lands, or territory thereabout, or relating to historical or geological reports on other successful oil fields and profitable investments therein, all of which were truly and fairly stated in said advertisements; said order or decision stating substantially that the newspapers were to be treated leniently, and that said M. Truax was the party they were after."

Plaintiffs allege that by reason of the invalidity of the Corporate Securities Act no criminal cause of action exists against plaintiffs or M. Truax or the San Diego newspapers. It is further alleged that prosecutions under this act would cause a multiplicity of prosecutions and litigation.

It is nowhere alleged in the complaint that there has been any discovery of oil upon any of the property located by the plaintiffs or their associates. On this subject it is alleged the lands located as oil claims and described in the complaint "were surveyed lands of the United States, known as mineral lands, and having the usual and very favorable geological and surface indications and evidence of containing valuable and extensive deposits of petroleum and mineral oils in commercial quantities; that said lands were open to location and development under the laws of the United States by these plaintiffs, and other persons qualified under such laws."

It is further alleged that experienced oil experts were employed by the plaintiffs to examine, test, and report upon the lands; that from such examinations and testings a report was made in which it was stated:

"That the geological indications and evidence were unusually favorable for large and profitable deposits of mineral oil, and that apparently it would be developed into one of the best producing oil fields in the United States."

These allegations fall short of alleging a discovery of oil within the meaning of the United States Statutes authorizing the location of government mineral lands. U. S. Revised Statutes, 2324–2329 (U. S. Comp. St. § 4620 et seq.); Miller v. Chrisman, 140 Cal. 440, 73 Pac. 1083, 74 Pac. 444, 98 Am. St. Rep. 63; Nevada Sierra Oil Co. v. Home Oil Co. (C. C.) 98 Fed. 673–675.

[1] In the absence of discovery, the location of these lands merely authorized the locator to maintain possession while diligently and in good faith prosecuting the work of endeavoring to discover minerals thereon. The rule is thus stated in Union Oil Co. v. Smith, 249 U. S. 337, 39 Sup. Ct. 308, 63 L. Ed. 635:

"In the California courts the right of a locator before discovery while in possession of his claim and prosecuting exploration work is recognized as a substantial interest, extending not only as far as the pedis possessio but to the limits of the claim as located; so that if a duly qualified person peaceably and in good faith enters upon vacant lands of the United States prior to discovery but for the purpose of discovering oil or other valuable mineral deposits, there being no valid mineral location upon it, such person has the right to maintain possession as against violent, fraudulent, and surreptitious intrusions so long as he continues to occupy the land to the exclusion of others and diligently and in good faith prosecutes the work of endeavoring to discover mineral thereon. Miller v. Chrisman, 140 Cal. 440, 447, 98 Am. St. Rep. 63, 73 Pac. 1083, 74 Pac. 444 (case affirmed in 197 U. S. 313, 49 L. Ed. 770, 25 Sup. Ct. 468); Weed v. Snook, ubi supra; Merced Oil Min. Co. v. Patterson, 153 Cal. 624, 625, 96 Pac. 90; 162 Cal. 358, 361, 122 Pac. 950; McLemore v. Express Oil Co., 158 Cal. 559, 562, 139 Am. St. Rep. 147, 112 Pac. 59."

The expense of drilling one oil well is from $100,000, to $150,000. Under the system of financing adopted by the promoters of the corporation, it would receive money enough to only sink one well to such a depth as $100,000 might justify. In order to hold the balance of the land located, it would be essential to put down an oil well on each 160 acres of land (Union Oil Co. v. Smith, supra), which would cost $5,600,000, at the estimated cost of $100,000 per well. It is thus apparent that under the scheme adopted for financing this corporation only one well could be sunk, which, if successful, would give the corporation title to 160 acres of land. It is also apparent from the foregoing that none of the parties interested in this organization believed that the property transferred to the corporation was worth $2,496,000, and that the offering of the corporate stock at 10 cents per share, with a commission of all over that amount, was an indication of their belief that the stock was not worth more than 10 cents per share.

[2] It is proposed to issue stock to purchasers who pay therefor only 10 cents, as fully paid up. Under our decisions, if the purchaser is aware of the initial transaction he would be liable to the corporation for the difference between the value of the property conveyed to the corporation for their stock and the amount of stock issued therefor, pro rata; if he was not, plaintiffs would be liable therefor. Sherman v. S. K. D. Oil Co., 197 Pac. 799.

It is apparent from the complaint that plaintiffs would be utterly unable to respond to this great liability.

[3] The respondent contends that the method of sale adopted, if stock is offered at 15 cents per share, was a representation to the public that the property of the corporation was worth at least $375,000, that is, 2,500,000 times 15 cents, and that it was in fact valueless. It is sufficient for us to say that it is manifest from the complaint that the issuance of the capital stock of the corporation was fraudulent as against creditors and stockholders, because of the excessive valuation placed upon the property acquired by the corporation, which brings the transaction under the rule announced first in Vermont Marble Co. v. Declez Granite Co., 135 Cal. 579, 67 Pac. 1057, 56 L. R. A. 728, 87 Am. St. Rep. 143, and adhered to through a long line of cases, the last of which is Sherman v. S. K. D. Oil Co., supra, holding such a transfer of corporate stock to be fraudulent as to future creditors, and that the representation upon the face of the stock was a false statement of the fact, calculated to deceive both future creditors and stockholders.

[4] In view of the fraudulent nature of the transaction sought to be carried out, equity will not aid the plaintiffs by an injunction, even if it be conceded the law attacked is unconstitutional, and the threatened action of the district attorney is therefore erroneous. It is sufficient on this point to cite a decision of the United States District Court, in National Mercantile Co. v. Keating (D. C.) 218 Fed. 477, wherein the constitutionality of the Blue Sky Law of Montana (Laws 1913, c. 85) was attacked by a plaintiff who sought to enjoin the enforcement of the law; but as the plaintiff came into court with unclean hands that court refused relief.

IRILARRY v. CITY OF SAN DIEGO.
(L. A. 6540.)

Garnishment ⟸17 — Garnishment cannot be levied on municipal corporation engaged in private enterprise.

A debt due by a municipal corporation in the conduct of a private and proprietary enterprise, such as a municipal water system, may not be garnished in an action against the creditor, under Code Civ. Proc. § 710, and section 710a, as added by St. 1919, c. 276.

In Bank.

Appeal from Superior Court, Santa Barbara County; S. E. Crow, Judge.

Action by John T. Irilarry against the City of San Diego. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

P. A. Bergerot and A. P. Dessouslavy, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

S. J. Higgins, City Atty., of San Diego, and A. F. H. Wright, Deputy City Atty., of San Diego, for respondent.

WILBUR, J. The city of San Diego entered into a contract with James Kennedy for the construction of a dam for a reservoir to be used in connection with its municipal waterworks. On May 1, 1918, there was due and unpaid from the city to the contractor the sum of $6,238.16. On May 6, 1918, a writ of attachment issued out of the superior court in and for the city and county of San Francisco in an action brought by Prosper Wolf against James Kennedy, together with a notice of garnishment, were served upon the mayor, auditor, treasurer, and manager of operations of San Diego for the purpose of garnishing all moneys, debts, credits, and effects due or owing to Kennedy. Thereafter, on May 6, 1918, Kennedy filed his claim with the auditing committee of the city, and the same had been allowed and paid. On December 20, 1918, after securing judgment against Kennedy in the attachment suit for the sum of $26,017.89, the judgment creditor assigned his rights to the plaintiff, who brought this action against the city to enforce his claim against the fund garnisheed. The court having rendered judgment in favor of the defendant city, the plaintiff appealed.

Appellant thus states his main contention:

"This appeal presents for determination, for the first time in this state, the important question whether a debt due by a municipal corporation in the conduct of a private and proprietary enterprise—here a municipal water system—may be garnished in an action against the creditor. The appeal is from the judgment entered for defendant, upon sustaining its general demurrer to the complaint."

The appellant apparently concedes that such a garnishment could not be levied upon a municipal corporation acting in its governmental capacity. He does, however, contend that in many states the rule is otherwise. In Skelly v. School District, 103 Cal. 652, 37 Pac. 643, it was held that a school district was not subject to garnishment and that the general language of the Code (subdivision 5 of section 542, Code Civ. Proc.) did not apply to a school district. This case was based in part upon the reasoning of the Supreme Court of the state of Illinois in the case of Merwin v. City of Chicago, 45 Ill. 133, 92 Am. Dec. 204, holding that a municipal corporation could not be garnished. In the case of Ruperich v. Baehr, 142 Cal. 190, 75 Pac. 782, this court considered the question of whether or not the salary of a municipal employee working in the electrical department of the public service was subject to the payment of a judgment as provided in section 710, Code of Civil Procedure. In determining that question against the employee it was assumed throughout the opinion that, before the enactment of the statute, debts due by a municipal corporation were not subject to garnishment. In that opinion it is stated:

"It is true that it is generally held to be against public policy to apply general statutory provisions for garnishee process to public corporations, so as to make them subject to such process, to reach claims for money due from them to a judgment debtor. And, for the same reason, general provisions making property subject to execution or liens are construed to apply only to the property of private persons and corporations, and not to that of public corporations of bodies politic. Skelly v. School District, 103 Cal. 652; Witter v. School District, 121 Cal. 350; Mayrhofer v. Board, 89 Cal. 110; Whitaker v. Tuolumne Co., 96 Cal. 100; Reclamation District v. Sacramento, 134 Cal. 480; Savings, etc., Soc. v. San Francisco, 131 Cal. 363."

The decision of the court in Ruperich v. Baehr, supra, that section 710, Code of Civil Procedure, was constitutional as applicable to a recognized class, is based in part upon the following reasoning:

"The fact that there has been heretofore no means by which moneys due from the state, or from its public corporations, could be reached and applied upon the debts of the persons to whom they were due, and that considerations of public policy required that public corporations and public officers and employees should not be held subject to the ordinary provisions and processes of law for the garnishment of debts and claims due or owing, sufficiently distinguishes the classes of persons and assets to which this section relates to justify the Legislature in making special regulations concerning the persons concerned and the mode of reaching the assets. It does not destroy its character as a general law, nor its uniformity of operation, that its provisions in these particulars differ somewhat from the ordinary processes of attachment and execution."

It is conceded by text-book writers that in a majority of the states the courts have held that municipal corporations are not subject to garnishment. Dillon on Municipal Corporations (5th Ed., 1911) § 249; Wade on Attachment, § 345; Shinn on Attachment and Garnishment, § 500.

It is unnecessary to discuss the reasons advanced in cases which hold to the contrary, as this court has adopted the rule most generally accepted, and the Legislature, by enacting section 710 and section 710a (as added by St. 1919, c. 276), Code of Civil Procedure, have provided a special method for the subjection of debts due from a municipality to the lien of a judgment.

It remains for us to consider whether or not the fact that the city was indebted to the creditor by reason of his contract for the building of a portion of the waterworks owned by the city takes the case out of the well-recognized rule. A municipal corporation is just as truly such when engaged in its proprietary capacity as when engaged in its governmental capacity. City of Pasadena v. Railroad Commission, 192 Pac. 25, 10 A. L. R. 1425, and the opinion of this court in Marin Water & Power Co. v. Town of Sausalito (App.) 193 Pac. 296, on denying a rehearing. Where it is engaged in building waterworks by contract the same reasons which would exempt the corporation from garnishment of its obligations incurred in its governmental capacity would apply with equal force to the obligations incurred in exercising this public function.

Judgment affirmed.

ROSSI v. CAIRE et al. (S. F. 9402.)

1. Corporations ⊂=619 — Six months' statute held not to bar existing right of action against trustees of dissolved corporation if action is brought within reasonable time after the statute took effect.

Code Civ. Proc. § 341, subd. 3, as added by St. 1917, p. 381, barring an action to set aside or invalidate any action of a majority of the trustees of a corporation dissolved by operation of law, including its revivor, unless brought within six months, does not absolutely destroy an existing right of action of a successor in interest of a former stockholder to obtain an accounting and distribution of the property owned by the corporation at the time of the forfeiture of its charter, and the proceeds thereof in the hands of the trustees, but requires merely that the action be instituted within a reasonable time from the taking effect of the amendment, so that an action instituted one month thereafter, though four years after an attempted revivor of the corporation, is not barred.

2. Corporations ⊂=619—Stockholders of corporation whose charter was forfeited held vested with right to have affairs settled by directors as trustees and property distributed among them.

In view of Const. art. 12, § 1, permitting the alteration or repeal of all corporation laws, the absolute power of the state over charter and the clear intent of the license tax act (St. 1905, p. 493) providing for the forfeiture of charters for nonpayment of the license tax was such that a corporation whose charter was forfeited for failing to pay its license tax ceased to exist and was no longer capable of holding title to or possession of its property, so that, in the absence of a provision of law for its rehabilitation at the time, its stockholders were vested with the right to have its affairs settled by the directors, as trustees, and property distributed among them pursuant to St. Ex. Sess. 1906, p. 25, § 10a, and it is immaterial that under Const. art. 12, § 7, a forfeiture of the charter of any except a quasi public corporation may be remitted, and that the Legislature, at each session previous to an attempted revivor of such corporation for several years, provided (St. 1906, supra; St. 1907, p. 745, 1909, p. 454; St. 1911, p. 1094) for remission of forfeitures previously had.

3. Constitutional law ⊂=93(1)—Rehabilitation of defunct corporation by act of trustees cannot impair vested right of nonconsenting former stockholder.

Though St. Ex. Sess. 1906, p. 22, St. 1907, p. 745, St. 1909, p. 454, and St. 1911, p. 1094, amending the corporation license tax act (St. 1905, p. 493), and St. 1913, p. 513, repealing it, while providing for the rehabilitation of such corporations as had previously failed to pay the tax, did not indicate how the assent of the former stockholders to such revivor was to be expressed, it was the intention that the statutory trustees, the former directors, who were simply trustees in liquidation, under St. Ex. Sess. 1906, § 10a, supra, should represent the former corporation in the matter of revivor, that their consent alone should be sufficient, and that the rehabilitated corporation should proceed as if no forfeiture had occurred, with all its former powers and property remaining in the trustees' hands subject to obligations lawfully incurred by them during its lapse of life, the proviso in the amendments of 1909, 1911, and 1913 that such rehabilitation should be without prejudice to any action, defense, or right which accrued by reason of the forfeiture not being intended to save the right of a stockholder to prevent the corporation's rehabilitation, but only to save such rights as had accrued in the trustees' management of the affairs of the former corporation, but the enforcement of such rehabilitation provision against a nonconsenting former stockholder, who diligently asserted his rights, would be an empairment of a vested right in property prohibited by both state and federal Constitutions, the rights of former stockholders under the statutory trust to have the property distributed among them being secure against impairment by any subsequent act of the Legislature, though Const. art. 12, §§ 1 and 7, does not prohibit such action, such vesting being complete prior to the attempted exercise of such power.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; James M. Troutt, Judge.

Action by Edmund A. Rossi against Arthur J. Caire and others, individually and as trustees of the Santa Cruz Island Company, and its stockholders, and others. Judgment for all defendants except Aglae S. Capuccio, and the latter and plaintiff appeal. Reversed and remanded.

See, also, 39 Cal. App. 776, 180 Pac. 58.

D. Freidenrich and Ambrose Gherini, both of San Francisco, and Orrin K. McMurray, of Berkeley, for appellants.

Frank P. Deering, J. F. Bluxome, and Myrick & Deering, all of San Francisco, for respondents.

ANGELLOTTI, C. J. This is an action brought by the successor in interest of a stockholder of the Santa Cruz Island Company, a domestic corporation for profit, whose charter was forfeited to the state on November 30, 1911, for nonpayment to the state of its license tax, against the five persons who were the directors in office at the time of the forfeiture and the only other stockholder, to obtain an accounting and distribution, according to their respective interests, to the stockholders, of the property owned by the corporation at the time of forfeiture and its proceeds in the hands of said former directors as trustees for such corporation and its stockholders. Aglae S. Capuccio, one of said directors and trustees, by answer joined with the plaintiff in seeking this relief. Judgment went in favor of the other defendants. The appeals here are by the plaintiff and defendant Aglae S. Capuccio from the judgment and from an order denying their motion to set aside the judgment and enter a judgment in their favor.

There is no dispute as to the material facts. The company was incorporated February 19, 1869, for a period of 50 years. It was a going concern until November 30, 1911, when its charter was forfeited for nonpayment of its license tax of that year. At that time it owned personal property valued at $250,000 and Santa Cruz Island, comprising about 58,800 acres of land. Its capital stock was $50,000, divided into 100 shares of the par value of $500 each. The four directors and trustees who are respondents here owned in the aggregate 79 of these shares, and respondent Helene A. Caire 7 shares, while director and trustee Aglae S. Capuccio, one of the appellants, owned 7 shares, and Amelia A. Rossi, plaintiff's predecessor in interest, owned the remaining 7 shares. At the time of the forfeiture of the corporation there was no provision of law looking to or providing for the rehabilitation of any corporation whose charter had been so forfeited. Section 6 of the license tax act of 1905 (approved March 20, 1905 [Stats. 1905, p. 493]), as amended in 1909 (act approved March 19, 1909 [Stats. 1909, p. 454]), provided for such rehabilitation only as to such corporations as had previously failed to pay the license tax and penalty imposed by the license tax act. The Constitution provided as it has ever since 1850, that "all laws now in force in this state concerning corporations, and all laws that may be hereafter passed pursuant to this section, may be altered from time to time or repealed" (section 1, art. 12), and also, as amended in 1908, that "the Legislature shall not extend any franchise or charter, nor remit the forfeiture of any franchise or charter of any quasi public corporation now existing or which shall hereafter exist under the laws of this state" (section 7, art. 12). The amendment of 1908 was the insertion of the words "quasi public," obviously for the purpose of limiting the prior absolute prohibition as to all corporations to quasi public corporations, and thus to allow the Legislature to provide, under its general powers with relation to all laws relative to corporations, for the remission of forfeiture of the franchise or charter of any corporation except a quasi public corporation, if it saw fit so to do. The original license tax act (Stats. 1905, p. 493) contained no provision for a revivor of the corporation whose charter was forfeited for failure to pay the tax, but at each succeeding session of the Legislature the act was so amended as to provide for such revivor as to corporations that had failed to pay. Stats. 1906, Extra Session, p. 22; Stats. 1907, p. 745; Stats. 1909, p. 454; Stats. 1911, p. 1094; and Stats. 1913, p. 513, when the act was repealed. By the amendment of 1906 it was provided that "any corporation which failed to pay the license tax and penalty required by the act" might pay the same within a certain time, and that any corporation so doing "shall be relieved from the forfeiture prescribed." The subsequent amendments of section 6 were substantially the same up to those of 1909, 1911, and 1913, each of which included a provision that "the rehabilitation of a corporation under the provisions of this act shall be without prejudice to any action, defense or right which accrued by reason of the original forfeiture." By the act of 1906 and all the subsequent acts relative to rehabilitation it was substantially provided that, in the event that the original name of the corporation or a name so closely resembling the same as would tend to deceive had been adopted by some other corporation since the date of forfeiture, then such corporation shall be relieved from forfeiture only on adopting a new name. In the act of 1906, and ever since, section 10a provided that "in all cases of forfeiture under the provisions of this act, the directors or managers in office * * * are deemed to be trustees of the corporation and stockholders or members of the corporation whose power or right to do business is forfeited, and have full power to settle the affairs of the corporation," and "to take such legal proceedings as may be necessary to fully settle the affairs of said corporation." The directors in office on November 30, 1911, apparently took no step in liquidation, and upon the enactment of the amendment of 1913 authorizing a revivor of such corporation as had failed to pay took the necessary steps to revive the corporation. No point is made as to the validity of the meeting of the trustees held August 25, 1913, at which the resolution looking to a revivor of the corporation was adopted. Four of the five trustees (all except Aglae S. Capuccio), owning 79 of the 100 shares, were present, and the action was unanimous, and another stockholder owning 7 shares requested such action. In accord with the resolution, application was made as provided in the act, the license tax for 1911, 1912, and 1913 and penalties and fee were paid, and on August 28, 1913, the secretary of state issued his certificate. Immediately thereafter the trustees delivered all the assets in their hands, including the real property, to the corporation, which has ever since been in the use and possession thereof. To confirm the title of the corporation to the real property a conveyance was attempted to be authorized at a meeting of the trustees held January 30, 1917, at which all were present except Aglae S. Capuccio, who had been notified, and sent a protest. In accord with this authorization a conveyance was executed by the four trustees present and delivered to the corporation. The corporation has ever since its revivor been acting as a corporation, holding its annual meetings and dealing with the property here involved as its property. The revivor of the corporation and all subsequent dealings with the property were without the consent of Aglae S. Capuccio, Amelia A. Rossi, and plaintiff, and it is not claimed that there was anything by way of act or omission in the conduct of either Amelia A. Rossi or plaintiff to estop either from making the claims here presented.

[1] This action was instituted August 28, 1917, just four years after the attempted revivor. Defendants interposed a plea of the statute of limitations, alleging the action to be barred by subdivision 3 of section 341, Code of Civil Procedure, a subdivision added by the Legislature July 27, 1917 (St. 1917, p. 381). This section as so amended bars an action "to set aside or invalidate any action taken or performed by a majority of the trustees of any corporation heretofore or hereafter dissolved by operation of law, including the revivor of any such corporation," unless brought within six months. We regard this matter and the finding of the court thereon as unimportant in the determination of this cause. The amendment cannot be accepted as absolutely destroying any right of action existing at the time of its adoption, which would be the effect if applied here in any other way than as requiring an action to be instituted within a reasonable time from the taking effect of the amendment. Section 17, Ruling Case Law, p. 676, et seq.

[2] The theory of respondents is that by virtue of the proceedings had looking to a rehabilitation the corporation was restored to life on August 28, 1913, with full ownership of the property in the hands of the trustees, and has ever since been functioning as a corporation, and that the interests of the former stockholders or successors in such property is only such interest as a stockholder has in the property of the corporation.

The status of a corporation whose charter is forfeited under the license tax act referred to is well settled by decisions of this court. The penalty imposed by the act for nonpayment of the license tax prescribed was exceedingly severe, and the consequence doubtless often disastrous. But in view of our constitutional provisions the absolute power of the state over corporation charters was such, and the intention of the act to accomplish this end was so clearly and unambiguously shown thereby, that there could not be any well-founded difference of opinion as to the result. The Governor's proclamation having been duly made, and the corporation having failed to pay within the specified time thereafter, the corporation simply ceased to exist, just exactly as in the case of a forfeiture for cause by judicial decree, without any existing provision of law for rehabilitation as a corporation. It was not a case simply of suspended animation, as under the present license tax law, but one of absolute death, and, as was held in Rossi v. Caire, 174 Cal. 74, 81, 161 Pac. 1161, a previous action involving questions arising out of this very forfeiture, the corporation having ceased to exist, it was no longer capable of holding the title to the property formerly belonging to it, or the possession thereof. Much is said in the briefs herein as to the correctness of the statement in Rossi v. Caire, supra, that upon the forfeiture under such circumstances the property of the corporation vests in the stockholders (subject, of course, to the claims of creditors and the expenses of liquidation), and the right of possession in the former directors as trustees for the settlement of the corporate affairs, it being claimed by respondents that the title to the property vested in such trustees. It is unnecessary, it seems to us, to discuss that question, for we cannot see that it has any substantial bearing here. Assuming purely for the purposes of this decision that the position of respondents is well grounded in this regard, it would nevertheless remain that the former directors would hold the title simply as trustees for the purpose of their statutory trust, with the former stockholders as the sole beneficiaries, subject, of course, to the claims of creditors. Section 10a of the license tax act made them simply trustees to settle the affairs of the defunct corporation—trustees in liquidation to conserve its property, discharge its obligations, and deliver or account for any residue to the beneficiaries, the former stockholders. While section 10a says that such former directors are deemed to be the trustees "of the corporation and stockholders or members of the corporation whose power or right to do business is forfeited," this does not mean that they are anything more than "trustees in liquidation," and "they cannot be allowed or required to perform further functions in their capacity as a corporation or as directors thereof." See Lewis v. Miller & Lux, 156 Cal. 101, 103 Pac. 496. It is plain, in view of our decisions, that upon the death of this corporation without any existing provision of law for its rehabilitation, the corporation could no longer have any interest in the property, and those who were its stockholders at the time of its death were immediately vested with the right to have its affairs settled by the trustees designated by the statute for that purpose, and the property remaining after such settlement distributed among them according to their respective interests. Such former stockholders immediately became the beneficiaries of a statutory trust created solely for that purpose. The former stockholders either had the equitable title to the property of the former corporation, subject to a charge in favor of the creditors to be enforced by the former directors as trustees for that purpose, or they had a legal title in such property subject to a power in the trustees to dispose of so much thereof as was necessary to pay the creditors. This certainly was the condition at all times prior to the enactment of the legislation of the year 1913 authorizing a revivor of such corporations as had theretofore failed to comply with the requirements of the license tax law, and whose charters had been forfeited for this reason. The mere fact that our Constitution did not prohibit the Legislature from providing for the remission of such a forfeiture was altogether immaterial to any question here involved, if in fact it had not so provided. And, of course, the fact that the Legislature had consistently at each previous session for several years made provision for remission of forfeitures previously had is likewise immaterial.

[3] This being the situation, we are brought to a consideration of the meaning and effect of this legislation of the year 1913, and the effect of the proceedings had thereunder with relation to nonconsenting former stockholders. Of course, in view of our constitutional provision relative to the remission of forfeitures, there can be no doubt that the Legislature had the power to authorize the remission of the forfeiture and the reinstatement of the corporation as a corporation.

But it does not follow either that the Legislature intended by the legislation of 1913 to allow the rehabilitation of the corporation against the expressed will of former stockholders, who had become vested with the rights to which we have referred, or that so intending it had the constitutional power to impair such rights. Appellants claim that no such intent is apparent in the legislation adopted, and also that the rights of the former stockholders with regard to a complete liquidation of the affairs of the corporation and the distribution of the property were such that, in the absence of acquiescence in an attempted revival of the corporation, they could not be affected.

None of the amendments to the old license tax act of 1905, which was repealed in 1913, relative to the relief of corporations whose charters had been forfeited, contained anything indicating how the assent of those formerly comprising the corporation, stockholders, or members to a revival of the corporation was to be expressed. It was simply provided that "any corporation which failed to pay * * * may pay," and thereupon "be relieved," etc. We think, however, after much consideration of the very loosely drawn legislation relative to forfeiture of corporation charters for nonpayment of license tax and relief from such forfeiture, that it was the idea of the framers of these relief amendments that the statutory trustees "of the corporation and stockholders or members," who, under the law existing at the time of the death of the corporation, were simply trustees in liquidation, and nothing else, should represent the former corporation in this matter of revival, and that the assent of this body alone and the payment by it of the tax and penalties would be sufficient to effect a rehabilitation of the corporation. We think also that it is clear that it was contemplated that the rehabilitated corporation should proceed exactly as if no forfeiture had occurred, with all its former powers and owning all the property remaining in the hands of the trustees, subject, of course, to all obligations lawfully incurred by the trustees during the corporation's lapse of life. Doubtless under these amendments, crudely drawn as they are, this would be held to be the situation in any case wherein a former stockholder did not diligently assert his objection to any revival of the former corporation which would have the effect of destroying his rights under the statutory trust. His consent under such circumstances would be implied, or he would be held estopped to urge that he had not consented. But, as we have seen, there is no question in this case of any lack of diligence on the part of the complaining former stockholders or the assignee of one of them. We are of opinion that the proviso inserted in the amendments of 1909, 1911, and 1913 that such rehabilitation "shall be without prejudice to any action, defense or right which accrued by reason of the original forfeiture," strongly relied on by appellants as showing an intent to save the right of a stockholder to prevent the rehabilitation of the corporation, does not refer to such a right at all. The provision contemplates a rehabilitated corporation, saying "the rehabilitation of a corporation," etc., "shall be without prejudice to," etc., and the whole intended scope thereof undoubtedly was to save such actions, defenses, and rights as had accrued in the management of the affairs of the former corporation by the trustees for the benefit of the former stockholders.

We are forced to the conclusion, however, that, so construing the rehabilitation provision here involved, its enforcement against a nonconsenting former stockholder who diligently asserted his rights would be an impairment of a vested right in property prohibited by both state and federal Constitutions. In this regard the very able argument of learned counsel for respondents to our minds fails to give sufficient force to certain facts which, in view of our decisions, must be conceded, and which appear to us to make the question a very simple one. We are not dealing here with an unenforced penalty. The judgment of death pronounced by the law on this corporation had been carried into effect. The corporation was dead, and had died without any existing provision of law for its revivification. Taking, for the purposes of this decision, the view most favorable to respondent, the legal title to the property of the former corporation had wholly vested in the trustees designated by the statute for the purposes of the trust declared by the statute, which were solely the liquidation of the affairs of the corporation and the distribution of the property remaining among the former stockholders. Subject to the expenses of the trustees and the payment of creditors, the former stockholders were the sole beneficiaries and the absolute owners in equity of the property. Under all the definitions this was certainly a vested property right. It cannot matter why such penalty of forfeiture of charter was imposed and enforced, or what the obligation to each other of the former stockholders would have been had such penalty not been enforced. The status with relation to the property had been created, and the terms of the trust upon which it was held defined. We do not see how it can be held that the rights of former stockholders under the trust defined by the statute, the right subject to the payment of the former corporation debts and expense of liquidation, to have the property distributed among them, was not a vested property right secure against impairment by subsequent act of the Legislature. Much reliance is placed upon the fact that the Constitution ever since the amendment of 1908, has impliedly authorized the Legislature to provide for the remission of the forfeiture of charters of private corporations. This it does solely by failure to prohibit such action. But the mere fact that the Legislature has this power does not authorize it to interfere with vested property rights over the protest of those having such rights, nor does it prevent such rights from absolutely and unconditionally vesting immediately upon the forfeiture without any existing provision of law for rehabilitation. Such vesting was complete prior to the attempted exercise of any such power. The provision does not purport to authorize the accomplishment of any such result as is here claimed for it against the consent of any of those who have become, by reason of the forfeiture, the owners in equity of the property. We would have an entirely different case had there been a statute authorizing remission of forfeiture and rehabilitation of the corporation at the time of the forfeiture of its charter. In that event the vesting of the property rights might well have been held to be upon condition. But there was no such statute, with the result that the former stockholder at once succeeded to vested property rights which cannot be impaired by subsequent legislation. The terms of the trust upon which the property was held by the trustees could not, therefore, be changed to the detriment of the beneficiaries without their consent.

Our conclusion upon this question necessitates a reversal.

The judgment and order appealed from are reversed, and the cause remanded for further proceedings not inconsistent with the views herein expressed.

W. F. BOARDMAN CO. v. PETCH.
(S. F. 9055.)

1. Corporations ⊜182—Hold property in trust for stockholders.

A corporation is the creature of its stockholders, and holds its property in trust for them; the stockholders, as between themselves and the corporation, being the beneficial owners.

2. Sales ⊜1(1)—Word "sale" given narrow or broad meaning, according to context or surrounding circumstances.

Under Civ. Code, § 1721, defining a sale, the word "sale," when used in a contract, does not necessarily mean a transfer for money only, and is not a word of fixed and invariable meaning, but may be given a narrow or broad meaning, according to the context or the surrounding circumstances and the conduct of the parties.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Sale.]

3. Contracts ⊜170(1)—Practical construction by parties evidence of meaning.

The contemporaneous and practical construction of a contract by the parties is strong evidence of its meaning, if its terms are equivocal.

4. Corporations ⊜308(3)—A transfer of assets of corporation to other corporation held a "sale," within contract entitling manager of former to per cent. of profits.

The transfer of the assets of a corporation to a newly organized corporation in return for the issuance to owner of first corporation of stocks and bonds of the second corporation held a "sale," within a contract between such owner of first corporation and the manager of its plant, entitling manager to a certain per cent. of the net profits on the sale of the company within a certain period.

5. Corporations ⊜308(11)—Testimony as to value of services of manager of corporation selling assets to another corporation held admissible in suit for per cent. of profits under contract of employment.

Where assets of one corporation were transferred to another corporation under an agreement requiring manager of first corporation to manage operations of the second corporation, testimony as to the value of such services was admissible in action to recover from owner of first corporation a certain per cent. of the net profits of the sale of assets to second corporation, under a contract, since the value of such services was an additional contribution of the owner of first corporation to the second corporation, and should have been deducted from the price paid to owner in order to determine the profits made by it in the transaction.

6. Corporations ⊜308(11)—Evidence showing improper management held admissible to show discharge of manager for cause.

In an action involving the question whether the manager of a gas company was discharged without cause, testimony as to facts showing impropriety and lack of necessity of laying a pipe line to supply water to the plant held admissible.

7. Evidence ⊜471(17)—Mismanagement of gas plants should be shown by facts instead of opinion.

In action involving question of whether manager of gas company was discharged without cause prior to expiration of his contract, where it was claimed that the manager had laid a pipe line 3,000 feet long and had installed a gasoline engine and pump at the end of such pipe to supply water to the gas works, when an equally good supply could have been obtained much nearer to the works, the facts showing the impropriety and lack of necessity of such pipe and pump should have been shown instead of showing it by the opinion of witnesses.

8. Evidence ⊂540—Witness experienced in operating and financing gas plants qualified to testify as to number of consumers necessary to make given length of gas main profitable.

In action involving question of whether manager of gas company was wrongfully discharged prior to expiration of contract, in which it was claimed that the manager had been guilty of mismanagement, witness, who had long experience in operating and financing gas plants in several places, should have been permitted to give his opinion as to the number of consumers necessary to make a given length of gas main profitable, regardless of whether he had had a technical education as an engineer or experience as a plumber.

9. Trial ⊂199—Instruction held erroneous in submitting jury question whether instructions violated by employee were material, proper, and reasonable.

In an action involving the question whether an employee was wrongfully discharged, instruction that he could not justify a violation of material and proper and reasonable instructions from employer in regard to the performance of his duties on the ground that he believed that he was acting for the best interests of the plaintiff held erroneous in leaving to the jury the question of whether the instructions violated were material, proper, and reasonable, since the court should have determined such question for itself, or should have stated the facts hypothetically so that the jury might know what was considered reasonable in point of law.

10. Master and servant ⊂44—Instruction on discharged employee's duty to procure employment held misleading.

In an action involving the question whether an employee was wrongfully discharged, an instruction that, while a wrongfully discharged employee is bound to use reasonable diligence to procure employment, he is not bound to accept any sort of employment that may be offered him, held indefinite and misleading.

11. Corporations ⊂308(11)—Instruction on failure to comply with ordinances as ground for discharge of manager held properly refused.

In an action involving the question whether manager of a gas plant was wrongfully discharged, the refusal of an instruction that any failure on his part to use reasonable care to comply with the ordinances of the town would be a reasonable ground for his discharge held proper, since a failure to use such reasonable care might be excusable under special circumstances.

12. Corporations ⊂294—Negligent or willful failure to comply with ordinances ground for discharge of manager.

Negligent or willful failure of a gas plant manager to use reasonable care to comply with ordinances of the town is a sufficient ground for his discharge.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by the W. F. Boardman Company against Thomas D. Petch, in which the defendant filed a cross-complaint. From judgment for defendant on the cross-complaint, plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Chickering & Gregory, of San Francisco, for appellant.

McGowan & Westlake, of San Francisco, for respondent.

SHAW, J. This is an appeal by the plaintiff from a judgment rendered upon a second trial of the case, following a reversal of the judgment entered on the first trial upon appeal to this court. Boardman v. Petch, 174 Cal. 259, 162 Pac. 1028.

A statement of the facts is necessary to a clear understanding of the points to be considered. On January 28, 1911, plaintiff and defendant entered into a contract which forms the basis of the controversy. The plaintiff was then the owner of practically all the stock in a corporation known as the Rogue River Valley Gas Company, having a plant situated at Medford, Or., for the supplying of gas and electricity for public use. By the terms of the contract Petch was employed "to devote his time, attention, and ability to the management of the property mentioned, by using every effort in his power to make it successful." He was to be employed for five years at $3,000 per year, in monthly payments. The agreement provided that in addition to said salary Petch was to be paid by the plaintiff 6 per cent. of the net profits received by the plaintiff on the sale of the Rogue River Valley Gas Company, should the sale be made on or before five years from the date of the contract. If the property was not sold within the five years it was to be appraised by a committee of three persons. They were to take the actual cost up to the time of appraisement, with interest at 6 per cent. from the time money was furnished to that date, deduct this from the appraised value, and the balance was to be deemed actual profits, upon which Petch was to receive 6 per cent., to be paid by the plaintiff. In this behalf the contract stated:

"The first parties (plaintiff) then agree to deliver to the said second party (Petch), or his heirs at time of said sale, this 6 per cent. in cash, or, if the property has not been sold, in stock or bonds."

By a transaction between plaintiff, Rogue River Valley Gas Company, and Oregon Gas & Electric Company, which was closed on June 3, 1911, all the property belonging to the Rogue River Valley Gas Company passed into the possession of the Oregon Gas & Electric Company. Whether this transfer constituted a sale, within the meaning of the contract aforesaid, is one of the principal questions in the case. Petch continued thereafter to manage the property included in the transfer as before until March 23, 1912, when he was discharged from further service. This action was begun on March 12, 1912, by the plaintiff by a complaint asking for the reformation of the aforesaid agreement in certain particulars not important here. On August 15, 1912, the defendant filed a cross-complaint thereto. Upon the first trial of the case the court entered a judgment of nonsuit against the plaintiff upon its complaint and thereafter proceeded to trial upon the cross-complaint. From this judgment no appeal was taken, and the complaint ceased to be a part of the pleadings in the action for any practical purpose thereafter. From the judgment entered upon the cross-complaint the plaintiff appealed, and upon that appeal that judgment was reversed and the cause remanded for a new trial.

Upon the appeal in that case it was conceded that there had been a sale of the property of the gas company which became effective on June 3, 1911, and the question whether or not the transaction above referred to constituted a sale was not discussed or determined. It was determined upon that appeal: (1) That under the contract Petch was to be employed for five full years at $3,000 a year, whether there was a sale of the property of the Rogue River Valley Gas Company during that period or not; (2) that under the evidence there presented, where it appeared that the plaintiff had continued in control of the plant after the transaction of June 3, 1911, Petch was bound to continue his services as manager for the remainder of the five years after such transaction, if the plaintiff desired him to do so; (3) that in addition to this salary for five years he was to receive 6 per cent. of the net profits of a sale, if made, within the five years.

After the reversal upon the former appeal defendant filed an amended cross-complaint, wherein he alleged: (1) A cause of action to recover the sum of $11,750 and interest, on account of unpaid salary on the five-year contract of employment aforesaid, based on the allegation that he was discharged from said employment without cause on March 23, 1912, being the salary due monthly from March 1, 1912, to February 15, 1916; (2) a cause of action for $23,700, claimed as 6 per cent. of the net profits of a sale of the Rogue River Valley Gas Company's property alleged to have been made by the plaintiff in 1911 as aforesaid; (3) a cause of action for special damages in the sum of $425, arising from the alleged wrongful discharge. In its answer thereto the plaintiff put in issue all of the essential allegations of the cross-complaint. This cross-complaint and answer presented the only issues to be determined upon the second trial.

These issues were tried by a jury, and a verdict was rendered in favor of the defendant on the cross-complaint for $8,175. From the judgment rendered on this verdict the plaintiff appeals.

It is conceded in the argument that no evidence was introduced to support the allegation regarding the special damage of $425. The points of controversy arise solely with reference to the first and second cause of action as above mentioned.

The plaintiff claims that the verdict for the sum of $8,175 is not supported by the evidence under either the first or second cause of action above mentioned. We will first consider the second cause of action, that for the recovery of 6 per cent. on the net profits of the alleged sale of the property.

The evidence on this subject is without substantial contradiction. The Boardman Company was the owner of the entire issue of stock of the Rogue River Valley Gas Company, even including that held by directors to qualify them to act. It controlled all its actions and it had furnished all the money used in the construction of the plant of that company, amounting to $112,605.74. (In making the deal under consideration the amount furnished was estimated at $125,000. It was afterwards discovered that an item of over $12,000 had been entered twice upon the books as a charge against the company. The true amount was found to be as above stated, and the matter was adjusted by returning stock and bonds to the Oregon Gas & Electric Company, the successor in interest of the Rogue River Valley Gas Company, to make up the amount of the mistake.) While carrying on the gas company's operations the Boardman Company concluded to enlarge the enterprise and construct other plants at other places to carry on the same kind of business. In order to do this it was necessary to obtain more capital. For that purpose it organized the Oregon Gas & Electric Company, with a capital stock of $1,000,000. To this company it immediately transferred all of its stock in the aforesaid gas company. Thereafter, until the transaction of June 3, 1911, was closed, the Boardman Company controlled the acts of both companies in carrying out that transaction. Two persons were found who agreed to invest $150,000 in the electric company by the purchase of bonds and stock thereof at a valuation of 90 cents on the dollar of the face value of the bonds. The Boardman Company then caused the gas company to transfer its entire property to the newly formed electric company, in consideration of the issuance by the electric company to the Boardman Company of bonds of the electric company for $195,000, taken at a value of 90 cents on the face value, that is, at the value of $175,000, and stock of said company to the amount of $293,250, or thereabouts, par value, as a bonus. When this was done, it will be seen, the Boardman Company had merely caused the gas company to transfer its property to the electric company, and in consideration had received all the issued stock of the electric company, together with the bonds aforesaid. It therefore controlled the action of the electric company as completely as it had previously controlled that of the gas company. The value at which the bonds were taken, if the equivalent of cash, constituted an increase of $50,000 over the estimated value of the investment in the gas company. When the subsequent adjustment was made the amount of bonds taken was reduced correspondingly, so that the excess of the value, measured in bonds, remained $50,000, as contemplated by the parties. The two new investors then paid in their $150,000 in cash and received $166,000 in bonds and $250,000 in stock of the electric company, both at par value. Thereafter the Boardman Company was the owner of the majority of the stock of the electric company and controlled its actions, as before it had controlled those of the gas company.

[1] A corporation is the creature of its stockholders and it holds its property in trust for them. As between themselves and the corporation, the stockholders are the beneficial owners of the property held by the corporation. Havemeyer v. Superior Court, 84 Cal. 362, 24 Pac. 121, 10 L. R. A. 627, 18 Am. St. Rep. 192; Ashton v. Dashaway Ass'n, 84 Cal. 65, 22 Pac. 660, 23 Pac. 1091, 7 L. R. A. 809; Hobbs v. Tom Reed, etc., Co., 164 Cal. 499, 501, 129 Pac. 781, 43 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1112; Rossi v. Caire, 174 Cal. 81, 161 Pac. 1161. Prior to the issuance of the stock of the electric company to the new investors, the only substantial change that had occurred, aside from the additional $50,000 to the Boardman Company, was a change of trustee of the property, the electric company having succeeded the gas company in that capacity. The change in the form of the indebtedness from an open account to bonds would not of itself have had the effect to characterize the deal as a sale of the property, and the transaction might have been considered a change of form only. But the debt was increased in the deal by the issuance to the Boardman Company of additional bonds of the electric company to the value of $50,000 at the discount price at which the bond issue was taken by all the parties. This was not added, so far as the evidence shows, on the ground that the services of Boardman Company in carrying on the business of the gas company were of that value. Nothing was said about such services, and the increase was not made as for services chargeable to the gas company, but, on the contrary, they were added as the profit going to the Boardman Company by reason of the transfer, and were designated as such. During the remainder of the year 1911 there were negotiations between the Boardman Company and Petch looking to a settlement of Petch's claim to the 6 per cent. of the profits, and in the course thereof statements were made by the company to Petch wherein the transaction was set down as a sale and the profits thereon as claimed by the Boardman Company were stated.

[2, 3] The Code defines a sale as "a contract by which, for a pecuniary consideration, called a price, one transfers to another an interest in property." Civ. Code, § 1721. It is also defined as "a transmutation of property from one man to another in consideration of some price or recompense in value." Anderson's Law Dic. 914; Mechem on Sales, § 1. The agreement whereby one person transfers a right of way for a ditch over his land in consideration that the other party should excavate the ditch and keep it in repair for the common use of both was held to be a sale of the right of way. Flickinger v. Shaw, 87 Cal. 130, 25 Pac. 268, 11 L. R. A. 134, 22 Am. St. Rep. 234. It is clear, therefore, that the word "sale," when used in a contract, does not necessarily mean a transfer for money only. It is not a word of fixed and invariable meaning. Eaton v. Richeri, 83 Cal. 186, 23 Pac. 286. It may be given a narrow or broad meaning, as may be indicated by the context or the surrounding circumstances and the conduct of the parties. "The contemporaneous and practical construction of a contract by the parties is strong evidence of its meaning, if its terms are equivocal." Keith v. Electrical, etc., Co., 136 Cal. 181, 68 Pac. 598; Kennedy v. Lee, 147 Cal. 596, 82 Pac. 257; Vulcan I. W. v. Cook, 15 Cal. App. 412, 114 Pac. 995.

The effect of the agreement between the parties was that Petch was to receive 6 per cent. of the profits of the Boardman Company's investment in the Rogue River Valley Gas Company in any event. If a sale was made within the five years, the profit was to be ascertained from the price obtained on the sale. If there was no sale, then it was to be ascertained by an appraisement in accordance with the agreement whereby the cost was to be deducted from the appraised value and the balance taken as the profits.

[4] In view of all this evidence and from these authorities we are of the opinion that the evidence was sufficient to justify a conclusion by the jury that there was a sale of the property within the meaning of that term as used in the agreement, and that they might have believed from the evidence that there was a profit of at least $50,000 received by the Boardman Company upon that sale. It is true that no money was obtained, but the bonds taken upon the transaction were valued therein at 90 cents on the dollar, and the jury would have been justified in concluding that at that time the bonds had that value in cash. On that issue, therefore, the jury might have decided that Petch was entitled to $3,000 as his percentage of the profits on the sale, with interest from June 3, 1911.

Under the rule established by the former decision, Petch was entitled to employment for five years at $3,000 a year, payable monthly, regardless of the fact that a sale took place in June, 1911. He could not be deprived of this right except by conduct which justified his discharge for cause. The appellant does not claim that there is not sufficient evidence to uphold the finding of the jury that the discharge was without cause. It appears that for the remainder of the five years after his discharge $11,875 would become due upon the salary, not including interest, and that during that time he earned by other employments $4,550, leaving a balance of $7,325 unpaid upon the amount which the Boardman Company agreed to pay him. The measure of damages in such cases is the amount of the salary agreed upon for the entire period of service, less the amount which the servant has earned or with reasonable effort might have earned from other employment. 3 Elliott on Const. §§ 2154, 2155; Seymour v. Oelrichs, 156 Cal. 801, 106 Pac. 88, 134 Am. St. Rep. 154. In Seymour v. Oelrichs the suit was begun and the judgment rendered long before the termination of the employment, and while it was said that the measure of damages was the amount due on the contract, less the amount earned, there was no occasion for considering the proposition of interest. Prior to the termination of the employment, of course, it could not be ascertained how much the employee would have earned during the unexpired portion of the time, and the damages would be unliquidated in the sense in which that term is used in the cases holding that interest is not allowable as damages for a discharge without cause. It does not follow, however, that this is the rule where the time had expired and the inquiry is made when the facts can all be ascertained.

"The law is well settled that where a contract for service is made for a fixed period, if the employer discharge the servant before its termination, without good cause, he is still liable, and the servant may recover the stipulated wages." Webster v. Wade, 19 Cal. 292, 79 Am. Dec. 218.

Where one was employed for a year to perform certain duties and was at all times ready and willing to perform them, but was prevented from doing so by the employer, and could not obtain other employment, his damage is the amount he would have received under the contract if he had performed the duties thereof. Hancock v. Board, 140 Cal. 562, 74 Pac. 44. We think the provisions of section 3287 of the Civil Code authorize the allowance of interest in cases like the present one where the damages are not estimated until after the term of employment has expired. That section provides:

"Every person who is entitled to recover damages certain, or capable of being made certain by calculation, and a right to recover which is vested in him upon a particular day, is also entitled to recover interest thereon from that day, except during such time as the debtor is prevented by law, or by the act of the creditor, from paying the debt."

Under the terms of the contract Petch was entitled to $250 at the end of each month. This obligation became absolute at that time, and the failure to pay each monthly installment was a breach of the contract. The amount was absolutely certain, except as reduced by the earnings of Petch in other employment. If the month had not yet expired when the discharge took place, the amount of such earnings would be uncertain; but after the expiration of the period—and in this case after the expiration of the entire period of the contract—the amount of his earnings from other sources was capable of ascertainment by calculation from the evidence on the subject of his earnings, and it comes within the terms of section 3287, upon which interest would be allowed on the respective amounts. The question of the right to recover interest was not raised upon the former appeal, and there is nothing in the opinion then rendered that is decisive of that question. The evidence shows without dispute that for the first three months after his discharge he had no employment. Three monthly payments would become due during that period and each would draw interest. Also from February 1, 1913, to March 1, 1914, he was without employment, and $3,250 became owing for the monthly payments. In short, a mere calculation will show that the amount of the unpaid balance of his five-year contract, with interest from the time the payments became due, would more than equal the amount of the verdict. There is no claim that he was lacking in diligence in endeavoring to get other employment. It follows that we cannot say that the evidence is insufficient to support a verdict for the amount given.

The evidence sustaining the verdict is, however, rather unsatisfactory, and errors of law were made at the trial which we feel must have been prejudicial to the plaintiff, and we proceed to consider them.

There was evidence to the effect that a part of the arrangement for the transfer from the gas company to the electric company was that the Boardman Company should take charge of, oversee, and superintend the operations of the electric company for a period of five years thereafter, and superintend the construction of the new plants to be erected at Grants Pass and Roseburg, all without any charge therefor to the electric company, and that it had performed that part of the agreement up to the time of trial.

[5] The plaintiff then offered evidence to prove the value of such services, and the court refused to admit the evidence. This ruling was erroneous. The fact that the Boardman Company held the majority of the stock of the electric company did not put upon it any obligation to perform these services. That service would have been the duty of the managing officers of the company, and for performing it they would have been entitled to compensation from the company, which would have come out of all stockholders alike. If this agreement was, as the testimony indicated, a part of the consideration for the transfer, then the value of the services was an additional contribution of the Boardman Company, and should have been deducted from the price paid to it in order to determine the profits made by it in the transaction. The evidence should have been admitted.

[6, 7] Upon the question whether or not Petch was discharged without cause there was a sharp conflict in the evidence. The plaintiff should have been allowed to prove his conduct in managing the property during the time he served in that capacity, in so far as it indicated his want of capacity or neglect of duty. It should, therefore, have been allowed to prove, if it could, that it was not necessary or proper for Petch to lay a pipe line 3,000 feet long across the property of another, and to buy and install a gasoline engine and pump in a well at the end of such pipe, to supply water to the gas works, when an equally good supply could have been obtained much nearer to the works. The form of the question put to the witness to elicit this information was faulty, and if the objection had been to the form alone it should have been sustained. The facts showing the impropriety or lack of necessity should have been shown instead of showing it by the opinion of the witness. But the objection was that the evidence was irrelevant and immaterial, not that the question was defective in form, and the ruling had the effect of excluding the evidence entirely.

[8] The witness Boardman should have been allowed to give his opinion as to the number of consumers that were necessary to make a given length of gas main profitable. He had had long experience in operating and financing gas plants in several places and was qualified to testify on the subject. It was not necessary that he should have had a technical education as an engineer or experience as a plumber. The evidence had a direct bearing on the question whether or not the Boardman Company had good reason to discharge the defendant from its service, and its exclusion was necessarily prejudicial to the plaintiff.

[9] The court instructed the jury that, "if the defendant violated material and proper and reasonable instructions" from the plaintiff in regard to the performance of his duties, the defendant could not justify a violation of such instructions on the ground that he believed he was acting for the best interests of the plaintiff. The instruction was erroneous in leaving the question to the jury whether the instructions violated were material, proper and reasonable. Either the court should itself have determined that they were reasonable, or should have stated the facts hypothetically so that the jury might know what was considered reasonable in point of law.

[10] The instructions that, "while a wrongfully discharged employee is bound to use reasonable diligence to procure employment, he is not bound to accept any sort of employment that may be offered him," is ambiguous and likely to be misleading. It should not have been given in the form above stated, but should have been made more certain and definite.

[11, 12] The plaintiff asked an instruction that Petch, as manager, was required to use reasonable care to comply with the ordinances of the towns in which the gas plants were being constructed, and that any failure on the part of the defendant to use reasonable care would be sufficient ground for discharging him. The court gave the first part of the instruction, but modified it by striking out the last part to the effect that failure to use such care would be reasonable ground for discharge. The instruction as asked is not entirely accurate. It is not true in all cases that a failure to use reasonable care would be sufficient ground for discharge. The failure might be excusable. If the failure were negligent or willful, then it would be sufficient ground for a discharge.

On account of the rulings above mentioned we find it necessary to reverse the judgment.

The judgment is reversed.

In re ARMS' ESTATE.

ARMS v. HEATH et al. (L. A. 6740.)

(Supreme Court of California. July 28, 1921. Rehearing Denied Aug. 25, 1921.)

1. Stipulations ⊜3 — Parties could properly stipulate in probate proceedings to try title.

Superior court in probate proceeding properly permitted parties to stipulate that case should proceed in dual character of proceeding in the estate for partial distribution and a civil action by one of the parties against the others to declare and enforce his right and title to land.

2. Husband and wife ⊜49¾(5)—Facts held to create presumption of gift of money by wife to husband.

In a probate proceeding involving moneys accumulated by deceased husband in another state, facts and circumstances held to raise a presumption or inference that money given by wife to husband was a gift.

3. Husband and wife ⊜264—Evidence held to warrant finding that property was not community property.

In a probate proceeding involving the distribution of property accumulated in another state, evidence held to warrant a finding that the property in question was not community property.

4. Trusts ⊜352—Trustor not owner of property untraceable.

Where property, with the consent of the trustor, has been commingled with the property of the trustee, so that no part of it can be definitely traced and segregated from that held by the trustee, or identified as a part of any specific fund or property, none of it can be considered as the property of the trustor, and the trustor has no special lien upon the general estate of the trustee, which is superior to that of any other creditor, and his only remedy is a personal action for damages or for money had and received; but the case is different where the money or property can be traced into a particular fund or deposit, where it still remains, though mingled with other money, or where it is used to establish a particular business which was continued in existence and is carried on by the trustee, or some one taking from him with knowledge of the trust.

5. Husband and wife ⊜246—Separate property of husband brought into state remains separate property.

Where a husband brings into the state money or property acquired by him during coverture in another state, by whose laws it was his separate property, it remains his separate property after it reaches the state, and any property acquired therewith in the state, either by purchase or exchange, is also the separate property of the husband.

6. Wills ⊜733(1)—Rights of distributees vest immediately upon death.

Rights of legatees in property devised vest immediately upon the death of the testator, and hence Civ. Code, § 164, as amended by St. 1917, p. 827, purporting to change rule as to separate property acquired in another state and afterwards brought into the state and invested in land, could not affect rights of devisees under will, where testator died prior to its going into force.

7. Wills ⊜802(2) — Remaindermen, where widow takes under law, not entitled to immediate enjoyment.

Where testator died a resident of Illinois, leaving real estate in California and personal property elsewhere to the widow for life, with remainder in the real estate in California to respondents, but widow elected not to take under the will, and hence became entitled to one-half of all the real estate and personalty of the testator, the respondents did not become entitled to immediate enjoyment of the land involved, which was testator's separate estate, and the widow was entitled to a one-half interest in the life estate, and other heirs of the testator were entitled to the other one-half interest in the life estate, and respondents must wait until the expiration of the life estate before enjoyment of the land in question, under Civ. Code, § 1386, subd. 2, and section 780.

Lucius K. Chase, of Los Angeles, and Lincoln G. Backus, of Monrovia, for appellant.

Milton K. Young and Lyndol L. Young, both of Los Angeles, for respondents.

SHAW, J. Lucy R. Arms, widow of the decedent, appeals from a decree of partial distribution, embracing certain land held by decedent at his death.

The respondents are residuary legatees under the last will of the decedent, Harrison Arms. Arms died possessed of a large estate amounting to several hundred thousand dollars worth of property, situated in Illinois, where he then resided, and of certain lots on which was a dwelling house, in Los Angeles county, Cal. The real property in California was of the value of about $20,000. The respondents filed a petition for the distribution to them of the property in California, including certain household goods, offering to execute such bond as should be required by the court for the payment of their proportion of the debts due from the estate, as provided by the Code. Section 1658, Code Civ. Proc. The appellant filed objections to the petition, claiming that the property was the community property of herself and her deceased husband; that she had elected to take under the provisions of the law instead of under the provisions of the will; and that the respondents were therefore not entitled to the whole of the property. She also filed a cross-complaint, so called, wherein she alleged that she intermarried with Arms, the decedent, more than 50 years before his death, and had lived with him as his wife until his death; that at the time of the marriage Arms had no property; that subsequent thereto she received property by inheritance of the value of $35,000, which she intrusted to him for her use to invest and reinvest the same; and that all the property which said Harrison Arms had at the time of his death consisted of the said $35,000 of property originally intrusted to him, together with the rents, issues, and profits arising and accruing therefrom, and that therefore it was her separate property which was held by him in trust, and praying that it be so adjudged. The court found that the property was not community property, nor the separate property of the widow, nor property held by her husband in trust for her, as alleged, but that it was all the separate property of the decedent, and that the distribution should be made of the real property only, as prayed for in the petition. A decree was entered accordingly.

[1] Upon the trial the respondents objected to the jurisdiction of the court to try the claim set up in the cross-complaint on the ground that it alleged a claim of title to the property in the widow adverse to that of the decedent, and that such claim was not cognizable by the court in the probate proceeding. Thereupon the parties, in open court, agreed that the pleadings relating to her said adverse claim might be amended so as to constitute a complaint in equity to enforce her right and title, and that the case should then proceed in the dual character of a proceeding in the estate for partial distribution and a civil action by her against the residuary devisees and legatees to declare and enforce her right and title to the land. The proper amendments were made, and with the consent of the court the case proceeded accordingly. We perceive no objection to this method of procedure where the court and all the parties concerned consent thereto. The superior court has jurisdiction to hear and determine cases in probate and in equity, and its final adjudication under such circumstances would be conclusive on all the issues.

The claim of the appellant is that the findings of the court are contrary to the evidence.

Arms died a resident of Illinois, and his will was duly admitted to probate in that state. The probate proceedings in California were ancillary to the administration in Illinois. The evidence shows that the estate of the decedent in Illinois was of the value of about $425,000, all but $75,000 of it being in personal property, and that the personal property readily convertible into money was amply sufficient to pay all the specific legacies, debts of the estate, and costs of administration. The claims filed against the estate in California had all been paid, except the inheritance tax. Shortly after the probate proceedings were begun the widow elected to take under the law instead of under the will, and filed, both in the probate court in Illinois and in that of California, her renunciation of the benefits conferred upon her by the will and her election to take under the law. Under the law of Illinois, a widow whose husband died testate may elect to renounce the provisions of the will, and in that event she is entitled to take one-half of all the property of the estate of the husband. There were no children or descendants of the testator living at the time of his death. In such cases, under the California law, the separate property of the husband descends, one half to the surviving wife and the other half to the relatives of the decedent—in this case his brothers and sisters and the descendants of such as are dead (Civ. Code, § 1386); and of the community property the surviving wife takes by descent one half and the other half is subject to the testamentary disposition of the husband, and in the absence of such disposition the wife takes the same share of such other half as she does of his separate property (Civ. Code, § 1402).

After providing for the legacies the will declares as follows:

"I give, devise and bequeath unto my beloved wife, Lucy R. Arms, for her sole use and benefit, during her natural life only, the use, income and rents of and from all of the remainder and residue of my estate and property.

"Upon the death of my said wife, Lucy R. Arms, and out of the remainder and residue of my property and estate unused and unexpended for my said wife, as hereinbefore provided and directed, I hereby make gifts, devises and bequests as follows: [Then follow bequests amounting to $20,000, and it then proceeds as follows]: Upon the death of my wife, Lucy R. Arms, and after the payment of all of the gifts, devises and bequests hereinbefore mentioned and provided for are paid and distributed, I give, devise and bequeath all the rest, remainder and residue of my property and estate * * * to my sister, Gertrude Heath, * * * and my nephew, George L. Arms, * * * share and share alike."

We will first consider the claim under the cross-complaint, to the effect that the estate of Harrison Arms consisted entirely of the proceeds, income, and profits of the money intrusted to him by his wife in the early years of their married life.

In Dimmick v. Dimmick, 95 Cal. 328, 30 Pac. 547, under conditions similar to those here appearing, it was claimed that the property in question there was the separate property of the estate of Julia A. Dimmick, the deceased former wife of Elmer D. Dimmick, and not the community property of that marriage. On this point the court said:

"While the wife [Julia A.] had some separate property very many years ago, at that time it passed into the hands and commingled with the funds of her husband, an active business man engaged in numerous speculations in land, so numerous and so varied that at the date of this recent transfer it is impossible to say that one dollar of the money which she received from her father's estate, or its proceeds, passed into this tract of land."

The testimony here shows that the widow was married to Arms in 1861; that her husband was then without means, as she termed it "a poor boy"; that within the next eight years she received by inheritance funds amounting to $35,000; that she gave it to her husband "to invest in our business"; that she "let him borrow it" of her to go into business; that she "let him have the money for use in our business there, for the use of both of us"; that she "let him use it for my use"; that she first gave him $1,200 to buy oil stock and then $5,000; that he bought out part of a livery business in the year 1864, in Toledo, Ohio, with the $5,000; that afterwards he sold that livery business and with the proceeds started a better one and bought more horses; that he then added an omnibus business, and then sold both the livery and omnibus business and started what she called the "Arms Palace Car Business" in Toledo, Ohio. Just when this occurred does not appear, but this car business was carried on in Toledo until 1887, when he moved the business to Chicago, and there, until his death, it was carried on under the name of the Arms Palace Car Company, a corporation, of which he owned half the stock. How much of his estate consists of this stock does not appear. Some of the money she paid to him—how much she did not say—was paid for a silver mine which he bought. It does not appear what was done with this mine, nor what became of the oil stock above mentioned. She paid him the money from time to time and many years ago. She never asked him for any account, nor took a note or other obligation to repay the money. He never paid her any interest or any return for the use of the money, nor rendered to her any account thereof. In his will he states that he had at divers times presented his wife with money and property of the aggregate value of more than $200,000. She would not admit this value, but she did not deny the receipt of money, and she admitted that he had deeded her some land in Toledo, Ohio, which he had bought with the money received from her, and which she had subsequently sold for $100,000; also that he bought land in Michigan with the money.

[2, 3] It is obvious from her testimony that her husband was a very active, enterprising, and successful business man, and that the fortune of which he died possessed was largely the result of his own ability, energy, and industry. It is also apparent that it would be impossible at the present time, from the meager account which she was able to give, to trace the money which she delivered to him so many years ago through the numerous transmutations it underwent in the course of his business life so as to ascertain now what proportion of his estate is the increase from investments of her money, conceding that he held it in trust, and what proportion is the result of his own earnings and the increase thereof. Under such circumstances, and in view of the long-continued course of conduct of both parties indicating that the property was regarded and treated as that of the husband, a strong presumption or inference arises that she let him have the money as a gift and that she never intended to reclaim it in specie, or even to treat it as a debt. In view of the vagueness of her testimony as to the transactions between herself and her husband, it cannot be said that the court was bound to take her general statements and conclusions as a fact in opposition to this presumption. If his fortune had been accumulated in that manner in California, the presumption would be that it was property acquired during marriage, and was therefore community property. Under the laws of Illinois, as proven to the court below, the property acquired during the marriage is the separate property of the husband, unless it is transferred, conveyed, or given to the wife, in which event it becomes her separate property.

[4] Where property, with the consent of the trustor, has been in that manner commingled with the property of the trustee, so that no part of it can be definitely traced and segregated from that held by the trustee, or identified as a part of any specific fund or property, none of it can be considered as the property of the trustor. "The right of pursuing it fails when the means of ascertainment fails. This is always the case where the subject-matter is turned into money and mixed and confounded in a general mass of property of the same description." Where the identity cannot be traced the trustor "is forced to rely upon the personal liability of the trustee. * * * He has no special lien upon the general estate of the trustee which is superior to that of any other creditor," and his only remedy is a personal action for damages or for money had and received Lathrop v. Bampton, 31 Cal. 23, 89 Am. Dec 141. There are many other cases to the same effect. Byrne v. Byrne, 113 Cal. 299, 45 Pac. 536; Reid v. Reid, 112 Cal. 278, 44 Pac. 564; Estate of Boody, 113 Cal. 687, 45 Pac. 858; Orcutt v. Gould, 117 Cal. 316, 49 Pac. 188; McGrath v. Carroll, 110 Cal. 83, 42 Pac. 466; Miller v. Ash, 156 Cal. 565, 105 Pac. 600; Rowland v. Madden, 72 Cal. 18, 12 Pac. 226, 870; Faulkner v. Hendy, 103 Cal. 15, 36 Pac. 1021; Estate of Dutard, 147 Cal. 257, 81 Pac. 519; Title, etc., Co. v. Ingersoll, 158 Cal. 484, 111 Pac. 360; People v. California, etc., Co., 175 Cal. 759, 167 Pac. 388. The case is different, of course, where the money or prop erty of the trustor can be traced into a particular fund or deposit, where it still remains, though mingled with other money, or where it is used to establish a particular business which was continued in existence and is carried on by the trustee or some one taking from him with knowledge of the trust. Elizalde v. Elizalde, 137 Cal. 641, 66 Pac. 369, 70 Pac. 861, Moore v. Jones, 63 Cal. 15, and Byrne v. McGrath, 130 Cal. 316, 62 Pac. 559, 80 Am. St. Rep. 127, are of this character. The evidence in this case is not of such character that we can say, as matter of law, that the court below should have found that the fund can be traced and identified, within the rules laid down in the cases last cited.

Our conclusion is that the findings that the property was not the separate property of Lucy R. Arms nor subject to any trust in her favor is not contrary to the evidence.

[5] What has been said establishes the fact that the property which Harrison Arms accumulated and earned in Illinois, during coverture, was not community property of the marriage, but was his separate property. It has long been the established law of this state that where a husband brings into this state money or property acquired by him during coverture in another state, by whose laws it was his separate property, it remains his separate property after it reaches this state, and that any property acquired therewith in this state, either by purchase or exchange, is also the separate property of the husband. Kraemer v. Kraemer, 52 Cal. 302; Shumway v. Leakey, 67 Cal. 460, 8 Pac. 12; Estate of Niccolls, 164 Cal. 372, 129 Pac. 278; Estate of Warner, 167 Cal. 686, 140 Pac. 583. It appears without dispute that the land ordered distributed to the residuary legatees was purchased by the decedent with money brought by him from Illinois which was a part of the property there accumulated by him as aforesaid, and which was therefore his separate property. It follows that said land was also his separate property and subject to his testamentary disposition. This being the case, it was disposed of in his will by the residuary clause above recited; the separate property being subject to his testamentary disposition according to the law of this state.

[6] The amendment of 1917 to section 164, Civil Code (Stats. 1917, p. 827), purports to change the above-stated rule as to property acquired in another state and afterwards brought into this state. It appears to declare that all property of a husband or wife acquired after marriage (other than that acquired by gift, bequest, devise or descent) is community property, regardless alike of the place of its acquisition and of the place where it is situated, except that property conveyed to the wife by an instrument in writing is presumed to be her separate property. But this amendment was not in force until July 27, 1917. Arms died on July 5, 1917, and the rights here involved became vested immediately upon his death. Hence the amendment of 1917, even if it is valid, does not affect the case in any manner. We mention it only for the purpose of noting that fact.

On behalf of the appellant her counsel argue that the property acquired by the decedent in Illinois should be treated as community property here, for the reason that "the incidents of the husband's estate in Illinois are more nearly identical with the incidents of ownership of community property in California than with the incidents of the ownership of our separate property," and that "separate property, as we understand the term, is unknown in Illinois." Doubtless the incidents of ownership of separate property in Illinois are not precisely identical with the incidents of such ownership here, for the laws of the respective states relating to the use, enjoyment, disposition, and descent of property are not identical in all respects. But there is no substantial difference between the idea of separate property, as we understand it, and the conception of it prevailing in Illinois. The law of Illinois governing the acquisition, use, enjoyment, and conveyance. The same is true as to the husband is not similar to our law respecting these incidents of community property. Community property is unknown here. There, a conveyance to the wife, otherwise than in trust, vests in her the absolute title, irrespective of the source of the consideration for the conveyance. The same is true as to the husband's title upon a conveyance to him. Transfers of personal property which pass any title or interest therein also pass to the transferee, whether husband or wife, the title to the property as his or her separate property. Separate property there is the separate property known to the common law, as it is also here, except as in either state it may have been changed by statute. The rights of the respective spouses upon a dissolution of the marriage by divorce in Illinois are not similar to the rights in community property in this state upon divorce. The rights of the widow in the realty on the death of the husband in Illinois are the same in character as those rights under the common law, except that a fee in one-third has been substituted for the common-law estate of dower. No distinction is made there between property earned by the husband before and after marriage, as it is here, either with regard to marital rights, rights of inheritance, or upon divorce. The husband's power of disposition of his separate estate in Illinois during his life is not restricted, as is his right here to dispose of community property. In short, the incidents of ownership, so far as they are similar at all, are not of such character as to make that which is the separate property of the husband in Illinois community property of the marriage when it is brought into this state. We cannot doubt that this proposition received consideration in the cases on the subject above cited, although it was not specially mentioned. The aforesaid decisions have become a rule of property and cannot be changed by the courts upon considerations such as are here presented.

[7] The appellant claims further that the court below erred in distributing the entire interest in the real property to the two residuary devisees. The theory advanced in support of this contention is that upon her election to renounce the will and take under the law the life estate given to her became ineffective; that that interest in the real property thereupon went back into the general estate, and, not having been effectually disposed of by the will, the testator died intestate as to that life estate. This being the case, and it being his separate property, as we have seen, they say that under the Code one half of it descended to her and the other half to his brothers and sisters and the descendants of such as are dead (Civ. Code, § 1386, subd. 2), and that it should have been distributed accordingly.

We see no escape from the conclusion that the widow is entitled to distribution of a one-half interest in this real estate for the period of her own life. The terms of the will are such that the estate given to the two residuary devisees did not begin in possession and enjoyment until after her death. It provides that "Upon the death of my wife, * * * and out of the remainder and residue of my property and estate unused and unexpended for my said wife" the legacies amounting to $20,000 were to be paid, presumably by the executors, since no provision is made for the payment by any trustees or other person. The residue is then given by the following words:

"Upon the death of my wife, * * * and after the payment of all of the gifts, devises and bequests hereinbefore mentioned and provided are paid and distributed, I give, devise and bequeath all of the rest, remainder and residue of my property," to Gertrude Heath and George L. Arms.

The phrase "upon the death" usually refers to the time of enjoyment and not to the time of vesting, and doubtless it was so used here. But the decisive point here is the time of enjoyment, and it is clear that this did not begin until after the happening of both of the events mentioned, namely, the death of the widow and the payment of the legacies which did not become due until her death. Hence the estate in the property in the meantime was not included in the residue described and did not go to said residuary legatees, but was disposed of only by the provision for the wife, and when she renounced it that portion of the estate remained without effective testamentary disposition. As to that, the effect was the same as if he had died intestate.

Where a legacy or devise is rejected by the beneficiary, and there is a residuary clause which would include it by its terms, the property so refused goes into the residue, and the residuary legatee or devisee takes it by virtue thereof. Macknet's Ex'rs v. Macknet, 24 N. J. Eq. 289; 18 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) 762; 40 Cyc. 1950. But if the residuary clause is not general or is not couched in language that would include the property so refused, such property goes to the heirs at law as property of which the testator died intestate. Bugbee v. Sargent, 23 Me. 271; Temple v. Nelson, 45 Mass. (4 Metc.) 584; James v. James, 4 Paige Ch. (N. Y.) 115; 18 Am. & Eng. Ency. of Law (2d Ed.) 761; 40 Cyc. 1941.

In California a widow is not put to her election by a gift to her of the separate property of the husband, unless the will is so drawn as to make an election necessary. As to that property she stands upon the same footing as any other beneficiary. But any person may refuse to accept a provision for him or her in a will, and of course a widow may do so. When the widow elected to take under the law and renounced the provisions of the will for her benefit, the devise to her of the use, rents, and income of the real property in question during her natural life became inoperative, and that portion of the estate of the testator therefore fell into the undisposed of residue and descended to his heirs at law. The widow was one of the heirs of the husband, with respect to his separate estate, and under the circumstances of this case she was entitled to one-half of all the property not disposed of by the will. It follows that she was entitled to one half of this life estate, and the other half thereof descended in equal shares to the brothers and sisters of the testator and to the children or grandchildren of any deceased brother or sister by right of representation. Civ. Code, § 1386, subd. 2. The decree should have made distribution accordingly.

There are cases which hold that upon a refusal of the widow to take a life estate given in lieu of her positive rights under the law, such as dower or other interest in land not subject to the husband's testamentary disposition, where there is a remainder over to residuary devisees, the vesting of the remainder is accelerated, so that the residuary devisees may take before the widow's death. But the weight of authority and the better reason is the other way. Hauk v. McComas, 98 Ind. 464. In effect, such a doctrine would operate as a judicial devise of the decedent's estate—a supplementary will not made by the testator. We think the court is without power to do that, even if it would be more convenient in the particular case. Moreover, it appears to be contrary to section 780 of the Civil Code.

The judgment is reversed and the cause remanded, with directions to the court below to distribute the life estate in the realty in accordance with this opinion and the remainder therein to the respondents.

PEOPLE v. HINRICH. (Cr. 550.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 14, 1921.)

1. Infants ⊂⊃20—Evidence sufficient to sustain conviction of lewd conduct on body of child.

In a prosecution for lewd and lascivious conduct on the body of a girl of the age of 8½ years, evidence held sufficient to sustain conviction.

2. Witnesses ⊂⊃243 — Leading questions to youthful prosecuting witness permissible.

In a prosecution for lewd and lascivious conduct on the body of a girl of the age of 8½ years, leading questions to the prosecuting witness were permissible in the sound discretion of the court in view of the age of the girl and her embarrassment.

3. Criminal law ⊂⊃338(3) — Testimony of prosecuting witness permissible as foundation for introduction of measurements.

In a prosecution for lewd and lascivious conduct on the body of a girl of 8½ years, the trial court, to lay the foundation for the introduction of measurements made by a second witness of the distance from the place where a fire was built to the scene of the crime, properly permitted the prosecuting witness to testify that a few days before the trial she pointed out to another witness the place where the crime was committed.

Appeal from Superior Court, Stanislaus County; J. C. Needham, Judge.

Henry Hinrich was convicted of lewd and lascivious conduct on the body of a girl of the age of 8½ years, and he appeals. Affirmed.

E. S. Bell, of Napa, for appellant.

U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and J. Chas. Jones, Deputy Atty. Gen., for the People.

FINCH, P. J. Appellant was convicted of the crime of lewd and lascivious conduct upon the body of a girl of the age of about 8½ years. He bases his appeal upon two grounds:

"(1) That the evidence is insufficient to support the verdict.

"(2) That the court erred in overruling the objections of the defendant to the admission of certain evidence."

[1] The evidence shows that the defendant and the prosecuting witness, together with another girl of about the same age, and a little boy of four years, went from Oakdale on a Sunday afternoon to a place called "the slides," near which there is an irrigating ditch, then dry. For a time the children amused themselves sliding down the embankment, and then a fire was started, all gathering fuel. The defendant and the prosecuting witness, leaving the other children at the fire, walked for some distance along the ditch, bringing fuel for the fire on their return, and it was during this absence that the alleged crime was committed. The prosecuting witness testified in detail to the effect that the defendant placed his coat in the bottom of the ditch, had her lie down upon it and unbutton her drawers, then unbuttoned his pants, lay down upon her, and proceeded to the point of sexual emission, and that he then gave her 50 cents and cautioned her not to tell her parents. The other little girl testified that when the prosecuting witness returned to the fire the latter told her what the defendant had done, and showed her the 50 cents he had given her. The defendant denied any wrongful conduct, and also denied giving the girl any money. The evidence produced by the prosecution, if believed by the jury, was amply sufficient to convict. The credibility of witnesses is for the jury in the first instance and for the court on motion for a new trial.

[2] General objection is made that the district attorney was permitted to ask leading questions of the prosecuting witness, but no particular ruling is pointed out as error, and an examination of the record fails to disclose any error in this regard. In view of the age of the girl and her embarrassment in relating the sordid story in court, it was necessary for the district attorney to resort to leading questions in parts of his examination. If the course pursued is not permissible in the prosecution of such crimes, then offenders against little children will usually go unpunished. Leading questions may be permitted in the sound discretion of the court. People v. Clary, 72 Cal. 60, 13 Pac. 77; People v. Harlan, 133 Cal. 16, 65 Pac. 9; People v. Brown, 130 Cal. 591, 62 Pac. 1072; People v. Shem Ah Fook, 64 Cal. 380, 1 Pac. 347; People v. Goldenson, 76 Cal. 328, 19 Pac. 161; People v. Fong Ah Sing, 70 Cal. 8, 11 Pac. 323. Safeguards against unjust convictions must be found in the conscientious discharge of their duties by trial judges and prosecuting officers, duties in which such officers seem not to have been remiss in this case.

[3] Objection is made that the court permitted the prosecuting witness to testify that a few days before the trial she pointed out to another witness the place where the crime was committed, and that the second witness was allowed to testify as to the place she so designated. The evident purpose was to lay the foundation for the introduction of measurements made by this second witness of the distance from the place where the fire was built to the scene of the crime. For that purpose the evidence was clearly admissible.

No error appearing in the record, the judgment appealed from is affirmed.

GREEN v. SOUTHERN PAC. CO. et al. (Civ. 3429.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. June 14, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 13, 1921.)

1. Negligence ⊂=135—Contributory negligence established by preponderance of evidence.

Contributory negligence is an affirmative defense which must be established by a preponderance of the evidence.

2. Railroads ⊂=327(3)—Pedestrian must look and listen.

A railroad track being a place of probable danger, a pedestrian approaching it must both look and listen to ascertain whether there are approaching cars.

3. Negligence ⊂=122(5)—Care on part of deceased presumed.

In the absence of direct proof of the conduct of a person alleged to have been killed by negligence, the jury may infer ordinary care and diligence on his part from all the circumstances of the case, his character and habits, and the natural instinct of self-preservation.

4. Negligence ⊂=136(9) — Contributory negligence for court on undisputed facts susceptible of but one inference.

To establish contributory negligence as against the jury's verdict the evidence must be such that the court must say that it is not in conflict on the facts, and that from these facts reasonable men can draw but one inference, pointing unerringly to deceased's negligence, contributing to his own injury.

5. Railroads ⊂=350(22)—Pedestrian's contributory negligence held for jury.

In an action against a railroad company for the death of a pedestrian at a crossing, where the evidence was conflicting as to whether deceased's view was unobstructed, and as to how light it was at the time, and the jury visited the scene at a time in the evening when the amount of light was about the same as at the time of the accident, and observed the placing and movment of trains, it was for the jury to determine whether the physical facts demonstrated a situation compelling the conclusion of deceased's contributory negligence through failure to look and listen for the approaching car.

6. Railroads ⊂=307(4)—Duty to provide flagman.

Keeping a flagman at a crossing is within a railroad company's duty to use reasonable care, corresponding to the circumstances constituting the probable danger to avoid injury to travelers.

7. Railroads ⊂=350(5) — Negligence in failing to provide flagman held for jury.

In an action against a railroad company for the death of a pedestrian at a much-traveled crossing, at which there was no flagman or other means of warning, where there was evidence that obstructions frequently interfered with the view of moving trains, it was for the jury to decide whether it was negligence for the company to run its cars across the highway without providing a flagman or warning signals other than those usually given by engines and cars.

8. Master and servant ⊂=333 — Verdict exonerating locomotive engineer held no bar to recovery against railroad.

Where there was evidence from which the jury might determine that a railroad company's failure to have a flagman at a crossing at which a pedestrian was killed was negligence, and a proximate cause of the accident, a verdict in favor of the engineer, joined as a defendant, did not bar recovery against the company.

9. Trial ⊂=295(7)—Instruction as to duty of pedestrian at crossing held not misleading when considered with instructions as whole.

In an action against railroad company for death of pedestrian at a crossing, where the jury were instructed that if deceased did not look and listen for the approaching train before crossing the track, and could have seen or heard it, and remained in his place of safety until it passed, the verdict should be for defendants, and that a failure of a pedestrian to exercise constant viligance to discover the approach of a train at a crossing and to make use of all his senses to avoid the danger is negligence precluding recovery, an instruction that if deceased stopped, looked, and listened, and did not hear or see, or, with the exercise of reasonable care, could not see the approaching train, he was not guilty of contributory negligence, though subject to the criticism that the jury was told in substance that if he looked and did not see, however careless his inspection and unseeing his eyes, they must find for plaintiff, was not such error as would probably mislead the jury, the instructions being considered as a whole.

10. Trial ⊂=295(1)—Instructions laying down substantially correct rule when examined together will be sustained.

Instructions are not to be tested by particular clauses without considering them in connection with the instructions as a whole, and if, when examined together, they lay down a substantially correct rule, they will be sustained.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Luis Obispo County; Benj. K. Knight, Judge.

Action by Zoy Green, as administratrix of Harry Green, deceased, against the Southern Pacific Company, a corporation, and another. Judgment for plaintiff against the named defendant, and the latter appeals. Affirmed.

W. I. Gilbert, of Los Angeles, and W. H. Spencer and C. P. Kaetzel, both of San Luis Obispo, for appellant.

Sullivan & Sullivan and Theo. J. Roche, all of San Francisco, and S. V. Wright, of San Luis Obispo, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. This is an action prosecuted by Zoy Green, as administratrix of the estate of Harry Green, deceased, against the Southern Pacific Company and George A. Brown, to recover damages for negligence which caused the death of the plaintiff's husband, who was struck by a "gondola" car at a grade crossing on Osos street, a public street in San Luis Obispo, the car at the time being pushed by an engine then being operated by defendant George A. Brown. The verdict of the jury was in favor of the defendant Brown, but against the defendant Southern Pacific Company. Judgment was entered against appellant in the sum of $21,500. While a motion for a new trial was pending this amount was, on suggestion of the trial judge, and by consent of the plaintiff, reduced to the sum of $15,000, whereupon the motion for a new trial was denied. From this judgment the defendant Southern Pacific Company appeals.

Appellant contends that the verdict was not supported by the evidence in this, that the evidence without conflict established the truth of appellant's plea that the injury to Harry Green, and his death resulting therefrom, were directly caused by his contributory negligence in failing to look before leaving his place of safety to walk over the track upon which he was killed. Osos street runs southeasterly from the business section of the city of San Luis Obispo, and crosses the railroad tracks at a point north of and near to the railroad station. The railroad tracks at the railroad station lie nearly due north and south. They run northerly on a slight curve, so that within a short distance north of Osos street their direction is southwest and northeast. The trains going northerly, toward San Francisco, are known as west-bound trains, and those going southerly at this point, toward Santa Barbara, are known as east-bound trains. The most westerly track of appellant is known in this record as the main track. Parallel to it, and easterly from it, are switching tracks, parallel, or nearly parallel, to each other, which are successively designated as tracks 1, 2, 3, 4, and 6. Tracks 4 and 6 are connected by a lead track (5) for the transfer of cars from track 4 to track 6. At a point about 150 feet northeasterly from the point where Osos street and track 6 intersect there is an icehouse located a few feet east of track 6. At 279 feet from Osos street track 6 is split into two parts, one of which is designated as "rip track 1," and the other as "rip track 2."

The home of Harry Green was located in a section of town easterly from these tracks. His place of business was somewhere in the city west of these tracks. That he was well acquainted with the railroad premises and the customary running of trains thereon is not denied. At about 20 or 25 minutes after 5 o'clock on the evening of November 20, 1917, Green approached these tracks while on his way toward home. With him were his wife and Mrs. Sarah Peacock. They were all walking, but Green had with him a bicycle. At the time of their arrival at the railroad tracks a freight train was standing on track 3. This train had been broken into two sections, leaving Osos street open between them. Gianopolis, a car inspector of appellant, was there in charge of an air hose which connected the two sections of the train. The inspector, in reply to a remark of Mrs. Peacock, said, "All right, you got plenty of time to cross." Thereupon Green and the two women crossed track 3 and proceeded across track 4 to the "lead track," 5, and thence, moving forward, attempted to cross track 6, and at that point of crossing the accident occurred.

It must be taken as established by the evidence that there was no watchman or warning signal at this place, and that no bell was rung or whistle sounded, or other warning given, of the approach of any engine or car on track 6. At the same time another train was moving in the yard. The freight train on track 3 was closed up immediately after the three pedestrians crossed that track. There were 23 of these cars, and one engine. Gianopolis testified that just when these cars came together he heard behind him some kind of a crash, and the scream of a woman. These facts concerning the freight train are pertinent in connection with the fact that the noises caused by the movement of its engine and cars furnished one of the reasons why the deceased probably did not hear the approaching cars on track 6. There is evidence that some cars were standing on track 5, north of the street, and that they extended to a point within 15 feet of the center of the roadway.

The car which struck Green was being pushed southerly by an engine which faced north, and which was pulling with it two tank cars. The train crew consisted of a foreman or conductor (Wilson), an engineer (the defendant Brown), the fireman Purcell, and Herman and Miller, brakemen. Wilson was on the north end of the north car, Brown in the engine cab, Purcell on the left-hand side of the cab, Miller somewhere north of the engine, and Herman at the rear end of the engine. There was no one at the southerly end of the gondola car, and there does not appear to have been any light there or on the train. The color of the gondola car was black, and the time was at dusk or twilight of evening.

This switching train had been made up at rip tracks 1 and 2, and on signal given by Wilson had started from that place toward Osos street just before the time of the accident. Appellant contends that the train came to a dead stop at the icehouse at a point about 150 feet from Osos street, whereas respondent contends that the movement of the train was continuous from the start at the rip tracks until the gondola car struck Green. Without quoting testimony we will say here that the evidence is sufficient to support respondent's position concerning these facts.

If the deceased was guilty of negligence, such negligence must consist of failure to use due care at the moment when he passed from track 5 to track 6. As he was killed instantly, the court was deprived of any testimony from him concerning the facts. The only testimony relating to those facts is that of Mrs. Peacock and Mrs. Green. At the time in question Mrs. Peacock was walking at the right of Green (the bicycle between them), and Mrs. Green was on the right of Mrs. Peacock. Referring to the conversation between those persons, the testimony of Mrs. Peacock is as follows:

That after passing track 3, Green said to her, "We must look before we go any further, as there was cars there. Q. He told you to look before he went any further because there were cars there? A. Yes, sir. Q. In what direction was he looking when he talked about these cars? A. West."

Again:

"A. We started on, and the next thing I knew his wheel hit me, and it warned me, and I hit her, and jumped, and I looked around; the wheels were on his chest, of the car. Q. What wheel hit you? A. The bicycle."

Mrs. Green testified as follows:

"Q. Before going upon this track, did you look to see if there were any cars moving? A. Yes, sir. Q. Or any engine? A. Yes, I seen; and I don't see any one move. Q. You say you saw no cars moving at all? A. I did. No cars moving at all."

[1-3] Contributory negligence is an affirmative defense which must be established by a preponderance of the evidence. A railroad track is a place of probable danger. For that reason the rule has been established that a pedestrian approaching such a track must both look and listen to ascertain whether there are approaching cars. This is a necessary part of the duty of a person to use reasonable care for his own safety. But—

"In the absence of any direct proof, * * * the jury are at liberty to infer ordinary care and diligence on the part of the plaintiff from all the circumstances of the case—his character and habits, and the natural instinct of self preservation." Gay v. Winter, 34 Cal. 153, 164; Larrabee v. Western Pac. Ry. Co., 173 Cal. 743, 161 Pac. 750.

In the case last cited, while recognizing the presumption that the deceased exercised ordinary care, it is noted that that presumption is given weight only in the absence of evidence on the subject of the deceased's conduct. The court quoted with approval Thompson on Negligence, § 401, that this is—

"An artificial presumption of so weak a character that it is not to be allowed to have the effect of evidence before the jury, where the uncontradicted evidence of the circumstances attending the accident overthrows it."

[4] The law being thus defined, and there being in the present case no testimony tending directly to prove negligence on the part of the deceased, appellant is obliged to rely upon its contention that the uncontradicted evidence of the circumstances attending the accident necessarily overthrows the presumption of due care on the part of the deceased. To establish this defense of contributory negligence, as against the verdict of the jury, the evidence must be such that the court must say that it is not in conflict on the facts, and that from these facts reasonable men can draw but one inference, and that an inference pointing unerringly to the negligence of the deceased contributing to his own injury. Zibbell v. Southern Pac. Co., 160 Cal. 237, 116 Pac. 513.

[5] Appellant contends that in this case the unquestioned physical facts demonstrate a situation from which no other reasonable conclusion can be drawn than that the deceased was guilty of contributory negligence causing his death. We are unable to agree with this contention. It is conceded by counsel for appellant that the cars on the fifth track may have obstructed the view of deceased until he reached the track on which they were located. The distance between the inside rails of the fifth track and the sixth track at the point where the deceased was walking was a little less than 9 feet. Counsel argue that, since both tracks curved away from the icehouse, the deceased, from the time that he reached the last rail of track 5, must have had a clear and unobstructed view of the entire track 6 to the starting point of the train which struck him. It must be remembered, however, that these incidents occurred in the dusk of evening, when the clearness and certainty of daytime light were absent; that the icehouse was in the background of the car as it approached; and therefore that there is some room for doubt as to the degree in which it may be said that the view was clear and unobstructed. This court cannot know to what extent the daylight had faded.

A very careful attempt was made to inform the jury upon that question. In accordance with a stipulation to that effect the court caused the jury to visit the scene of the accident at a time in the evening when the amount of light was about the same as it was at the time of the accident. Cars were placed and trains were moved for the purpose of aiding those observations. It was stipulated by appellant that the jury might take into consideration everything they saw and everything that happened upon that occasion. These observations, therefore, became independent evidence in the case, of such a nature, however, that it could not be transcribed into the record. The jury having been thus instructed by its own observations, as well as by the testimony of witnesses, was able to define the limitations of visibility of moving trains and stationary cars at the time of the accident. In view of these facts we are not in a position to say that the unquestioned physical facts demonstrated a situation compelling the conclusion of contributory negligence through failure to look and listen for the approaching car. Mrs. Green, whose situation was about the same as that of Wilson, testified that she looked to see if there were any cars moving, and saw none.

We have noted the fact that defendant's engineer, Brown, was a codefendant in this action. Upon these facts appellant suggests that because Brown was its agent appellant is exonerated by the verdict in favor of the agent. In Bradley v. Rosenthal, 154 Cal. 420, 425, 97 Pac. 875, 129 Am. St. Rep. 171, it was decided that where recovery is sought, based upon the act or omission of an agent whom a principal did not direct and in which the principal did not participate, and where thus his responsibility is simply the responsibility cast upon him by law by reason of his relationship to his agent, the effect of the judgment in favor of and exonerating the agent is such that the principal is thereby relieved of responsibility. See, also, Fimple v. Southern Pac. Co., 38 Cal. App. 727, 177 Pac. 871. So, in the case at bar, if the claim of negligence as charged against appellant arose solely from the conduct of the engineer in the operation of the engine and cars, without express instructions of appellant governing the particular manner of running the train, and without other acts of negligence on the part of appellant, a verdict and judgment in favor of the engineer would relieve appellant from liability for such alleged negligence.

The complaint, as amended at the trial, contains the allegation that, prior to the time when said freight car came in contact with the deceased, the defendant corporation carelessly and negligently failed and neglected to place or maintain any flagman or signalman, or any other person or persons, or to show or give any signal or signals whatever, at or near said Osos street, or on or near said gondola freight car, to warn or notify pedestrians, or other persons, crossing or about to cross said tracks of defendant corporation on said Osos street, of the approach of said gondola freight car and said locomotive. The evidence amply proved the truth of that allegation. That charge of negligence presented one of the issues which was submitted to the jury.

[6] Appellant replies that there is no evidence that the deceased was misled by the failure of appellant to keep a signalman there; that for years the deceased had crossed the same track under the same circumstances, and therefore could not have depended upon the presence of a flagman for his safety. Further, in this connection, appellant asserts that no duty was by law imposed upon it to keep a signalman there. But the law does impose upon a railroad company the duty to use reasonable care, corresponding to the circumstances constituting the probable danger, to avoid injury to persons lawfully traveling upon the public highway crossed by the company's tracks and trains. It then becomes a question for a jury to decide whether or not it was negligence for the company to run its cars across the highway without providing a flagman or some means of warning to travelers at the place of crossing.

[7] And where the facts in evidence prove that usually or frequently there are obstructions which interfere with the opportunity to see moving trains while travelers on the highway are approaching a much-traveled crossing, it cannot be held that, as a matter of law, it is not negligence to run trains there without warning signals other than those usually given by engines and cars.

"The question really is as to what is due care where the view of the tracks is obstructed, and it is usually left to the jury to say whether, in view of the obstructions, the company has exercised ordinary care in respect to the peculiarly dangerous condition of the crossing; whether ordinarily prudent men would have taken extra precautions; and whether such precautions were taken in the particular case. This rule requiring the adoption of extraordinary means to signal the approach of trains at peculiarly dangerous crossings also has frequent illustration in cases where trains or engines have been backed over crossings. Thus a railroad company has been held grossly negligent in backing a train across a much-frequented crossing, without a brakeman at the rear end as a lookout, and ready, in case of danger, to apply the brakes, and thus prevent collision or accident." 22 R. C. L. p. 990.

[8] In view of these principles, and the negligence pleaded and proved in this action, we conclude that the verdict in favor of defendant Brown does not bar the right of recovery against appellant. In their report to the company, the trainmen themselves said that the accident could have been avoided "if there had been a flagman stationed at the crossing." The jury, under the evidence, was authorized to determine that failure to have a flagman there was negligence and was a proximate cause of the accident.

[9] The final error claimed by appellant is in the giving of instruction numbered XXV, a part of which stated that if deceased "stopped, looked, and listened * * * and * * * did not hear nor see said locomotive or gondola freight car being run or operated upon said track, and was not aware of the approach of said locomotive and gondola freight car, or with the exercise of reasonable care and caution could not see," etc., the deceased was not guilty of contributory negligence. The words italicized by us direct attention to the point made. Appellant argues that the jury was thus told in substance that, if Green looked and did not see, however careless his inspection, however unseeing his eyes, they must find for the plaintiff. Standing alone, and interpreted according to strict rules of grammatical construction, this instruction does not state the law correctly, and is subject to that criticism. But there were other instructions bearing upon the same subject. The jury were told that if they believed from the evidence that the deceased—

"did not look or listen for the approaching train when he was on the track next to what is called the rip track, or when he was between said track and the rip track, and further believe that he could have seen or heard the approaching train which struck and killed him, and thereupon remained in his place of safety until the train passed, then the court instructs you that your verdict must be for the defendants."

In another instruction the court said:

"A railroad track upon which trains frequently run is itself a warning of danger to any person who has reached the years of discretion and who is possessed of ordinary intelligence that it is not safe to walk across it without the exercise of constant vigilance in order to be made aware of the approach of a railroad locomotive and cars, and thus be enabled to avoid injury. A failure of such person, so situated with reference to the railroad track, to exercise such watchfulness and care and to make use of all his senses to avoid the danger incident to such a situation, is negligence which precludes a recovery."

[10] Considering the instructions as a whole, the language criticized does not result in error of such a character that the jury probably would be misled thereby. Instructions to the jury are not to be tested by particular clauses, without considering them in connection with the instructions as a whole. If, when examined together, the instructions lay down substantially a correct rule, they will be sustained. Peters v. Southern Pac. Co., 160 Cal. 48, 69, 116 Pac. 400.

The judgment is affirmed.

BENUSSI v. HANNAH. (Civ. 3788.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. June 17, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court August 15, 1921.)

1. Carriers ⊜306(1)—Finding that defendant and not receiver was owner of building sustained.

In an action for negligent death of tenant of apartment in elevator, facts held to warrant a finding that the actual possession and actual control of the apartment building had been taken over by the defendant before the accident, and that a receiver in mortgage foreclosure proceedings was not in possession and control thereof, although the receiver's account was not settled and he was not discharged until after the accident occurred; the defendant being the purchaser at the sale under the mortgage.

2. Carriers ⊜306(1)—Ownership of building immaterial.

In an action for negligent death of a tenant of an apartment building in an elevator accident, it was not necessary for the jury to determine who was the legal owner or had the right to the possession of the apartment building, but it was only necessary for them to determine that defendant was actually in possession and control.

3. Evidence ⊜219(1)—Insurance policy and making of repairs admissible to show who was in control of building at time of accident.

In action for damages for negligent death of tenant in elevator in apartment building, where the issue was as to whether a receiver or defendant owner was in possession and control of the building at the time of the accident, court properly permitted in evidence, as an admission against interest, an insurance policy issued to the defendant upon the elevator in such building, and such was true of evidence that defendant immediately after the accident caused repairs to be made.

4. Appeal and error ⊜1067—Failure to limit scope of evidence not reversible error.

Where it is safe to say that jury had only in mind the single question as to which the evidence might properly be applied, it cannot be said that failure of the court to limit the evidence to such issue was prejudicial error.

5. Trial ⊜295(1)—Instruction construed as a whole.

Criticisms as to specific parts of the charge will not be considered on appeal, where, upon the whole, it was a fair and full statement of the law of the case.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; John Hunt, Judge.

Action by Minerva A. Benussi, as executrix of the last will and testament of Louis Benussi, deceased, against Jesse D. Hannah. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Aitken, Glensor, Clewe & Van Dine and E. F. Conlin, all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Sullivan & Sullivan and Theo J. Roche, all of San Francisco, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal from a judgment in favor of the plaintiff, as executrix of the last will and testament of Louis Benussi, deceased, who was killed in an elevator accident in an apartment house in the city and county of San Francisco. The action was brought by her against the defendant, Hannah, who was alleged to be the owner and in the possession and control of said apartment house at the time of the accident which resulted in her husband's death.

The elevator in question was an automatic electric elevator for the use and convenience of the tenants of the apartment house, installed at the time of the erection of the building some years before, and in operation at the time of the casualty in which the decedent lost his life. Mr. and Mrs. Benussi were tenants of the building, having their apartment on the third floor. On the evening of May 25, 1915, they left their apartment and proceeded toward the elevator; Mrs. Benussi reaching it first and touching the button which would start and bring to a stop the elevator at that floor. It arrived and stopped, when Mrs. Benussi opened the door and entered the elevator. Her husband followed, and was in the act of entering the open door when the elevator started downward, and Mr. Benussi was caught and crushed to death between the top of the door and the third floor, being partly in and partly out of the descending elevator.

The plaintiff, in the complaint, alleges that the accident occurred through the carelessness and negligence of the defendant in failing to have said elevator properly maintained and inspected. The answer of the defendant consists in denials, based upon the alleged fact that the defendant was not the owner or in possession or control of said building at the time of said accident. The case came on for trial before a jury, which, upon its submission, rendered a verdict in favor of the plaintiff for the sum of $10,800, for which sum judgment was accordingly entered, from which judgment, after the denial of a motion for a new trial, this appeal has been taken.

The first contention on the part of the appellant is that the overwhelming weight of the evidence in the case shows that the defendant was not in the possession or control of the building in question or of the elevator therein at the time of the occurrence of the accident which caused the death of the deceased, but that a certain Miss A. S. Morrison, as receiver appointed by the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco in a certain foreclosure suit then pending, was the person solely in possession and control of said building and of said elevator at the time of the accident. Much evidence was introduced at the trial upon this issue, of which the following is, we think, a fair summary:

The defendant herein, prior to January, 1914, held a mortgage on the real estate on which the apartment house known as the "De La Sierra Apartments" had been erected, and in the said month of January, 1914, commenced an action in the superior court of the city and county of San Francisco for the foreclosure of said mortgage, and in said action and under a power given in said mortgage moved the said court that a receiver be appointed to take possession and control of the property pendente lite. The court granted said motion and appointed Miss A. S. Morrison as such receiver. Prior to her said appointment Miss Morrison had been an employee in the office of the defendant, and she continued to be such employee of the said defendant after her appointment as receiver of said property. As such receiver, however, she took possession of the same, and opened an account with the Crocker National Bank in the name of "A. S. Morrison, Receiver," in which were deposited the receipts of said receivership. The foreclosure sale of the premises occurred on December 10, 1914, and the defendant became the purchaser of the property at such sale for the full amount of his judgment obtained in said foreclosure suit. A short while prior to said sale said receiver filed with said court her report and account as such receiver up to December 1, 1914, asking for her discharge as such receiver, and also filed a supplemental account up to December 10, 1914, the date of said sale. No other or further account of said receiver was ever filed, although her said account was not settled and she was not discharged until some time after the accident in question occurred. A few days, however, after said sale the defendant herein went with Miss Morrison to the Crocker National Bank, where a new account was opened in the name of "De La Sierra Apartments, J. D. Hannah"; the defendant at that time and place signing the usual signature card stating that he was the sole owner of the De La Sierra Apartments. He also at said time signed and left with said bank another card authorizing Miss Morrison, as his agent, to draw checks upon said account. In this account were deposited thereafter all of the receipts of the De La Sierra Apartments from and after the date of December 10, 1914, and no portion of said receipts were thereafter deposited in the said former account of said receiver, nor were any of the costs and expenses of the operation of said apartments charged thereafter to said former account, but the same were charged to and paid out of the account of "De La Sierra Apartments, J. D. Hannah." From that time forward the defendant assumed to exercise certain acts of apparent ownership and control over said apartment house. He discharged Mrs. Pels, who had been the resident manageress of the apartments during the time of Mrs. Morrison's receivership, and in so doing stated to her, according to her testimony, "You understand I have taken over the apartment house." He also and in the month of April, 1915, took out a policy of insurance indemnifying him against the claims of persons injured or killed in the operation of said elevator, in which policy he was described as the owner of the De La Sierra Apartments. On the day following the accident the defendant visited Mrs. Benussi, introducing himself as the "landlord" and offering the use of his automobile in making the funeral arrangements. Within a few days after the accident the defendant procured from the Elevator Repairs Company bids for the repair of said elevator, which bids he personally passed upon, and the cost of the repairs when made were charged to and paid out of the account of "De La Sierra Apartments, J. D. Hannah." It is true that the defendant, when he was called as a witness, denied that he had ever been, prior to said accident, in the possession and control of said premises; and it is also true that Miss Morrison also so testified, and that she resided at said apartments and managed the same during the period after her appointment as receiver and up to December 10, 1914, and that after that date she continued to reside there and attend to the details of the management thereof; but it is also true that during all of said time she was in the employ of the defendant and that she continued in his employ and continued to reside in said apartments and continued to attend to the details of the management thereof after she had been discharged as such receiver.

[1] From the foregoing facts we think the jury were entitled to draw the inference that the actual possession and actual control of said apartments had been taken over by the defendant on or about the date when he became the purchaser thereof at said foreclosure sale, and that he was actually thereafter and up to and including the date of said casualty in the full possession and control of said apartment house.

[2] The appellant urges against the force of this inference the fact that said receiver was legally entitled, during all of said time, to the possession and control of the premises; and this may be conceded without in any way diminishing the force or application of said inference to the liability of the defendant herein, since the question in this case is not who was legally entitled to the possession and control of the premises in question, but who was actually in possession and control of the same, so as to be held responsible for negligence in the maintenance, operation, and inspection of the elevator therein through the defective manipulation of which the fatality to the decedent occurred. Upon this subject the trial court properly gave the jury the following instruction:

"It is not necessary for the jury to determine who was the legal owner or had the right to the possession of the De La Sierra Apartments on or prior to the 25th day of May, 1915, but it is necessary for you to determine who was actually in possession and control of said building at and prior to said time."

We deem the foregoing instruction to embody a correct statement of the law applicable to the facts of this case.

The cases cited by the appellant do not controvert this doctrine, but at the most go only to the extent of holding that a receiver who is legally entitled to and is actually in possession and control of premises, as such receiver, would be the party to sue on account of injuries occurring during such receiver's legal and actual possession and control of the premises wherein such injuries occurred.

[3] The appellant, however, contends that the trial court committed certain errors in its rulings upon the admission or rejection of evidence during the course of the trial. The first of these alleged errors consisted in the admission in evidence of the insurance policy issued to the defendant upon the elevator in said apartment house. While it is doubtless true that such evidence is ordinarily inadmissible under the authorities and in the cases referred to by the appellant, this rule has no application to cases where the question in issue is that of the defendant's possession and control of the appliance which caused the casualty on which the action is predicated. In such cases the act of the defendant in insuring himself against liability and his statements made in the course of procuring such insurance constitute acts and statements against interest to the admission of which there can be no valid objection.

[4] The same principle has application to the acts of the defendant immediately after the accident in causing repairs to be made to the elevator, to evidence of which the defendant also objected; the purpose of the introduction of such evidence being that of showing the defendant's possession and control of the premises in which the appliance which caused the casualty was installed. The appellant complains that the effect of this evidence as to the insurance policy and as to the subsequent repairs upon the elevator was not limited to the sole issue of the defendant's possession of the premises at the time the accident occurred, upon his request made at the time of the introduction of such evidence. While the trial court might properly have yielded to the defendant's suggestion as to the limitation of these species of evidence to the single issue of the defendant's possession of the premises at the time the accident occurred, we do not think that its failure so to do was sufficiently prejudicial to justify a reversal of this case. Practically the whole case turned upon the question of the defendant's possession of the premises at the time of the decedent's injuries. The defendant offered no suggestion as to any subject upon which said evidence would be inadmissible; and it is safe to say that the jury had only in mind the single question as to which this evidence might be properly applied, in the absence of any specific request for a final instruction by the trial court in its charge to the jury. We do not think that this constitutes reversible error in this case.

[5] The appellant also contends that the court committed certain errors in its charge to the jury. We have examined the entire body of the court's instructions, and having done so we do not deem it necessary to discuss in detail the numerous criticisms offered by the appellant to specific parts of the charge, since upon the whole we deem it a fair and full statement of the law of the case.

Judgment affirmed.

1. Statutes ⇐149—Repealing act valid, unless inhibited by express constitutional provision or against public policy.

In view of Const. art. 4, § 1, vesting the legislative powers of the state in the Legislature, an act of repeal must be rendered effective, unless inhibited by some express provision of the Constitution or manifestly against public policy; the Constitution being a restriction on the powers of the Legislature rather than a grant of power, and there being no implication of the absence of legislative authority or power.

2. Statutes ⇐90(3) — Act repealing special act creating school district not inhibited by constitutional prohibition of creation of "corporations for municipal purposes" by special laws.

Act May 2, 1919 (St. 1919, p. 239), repealing Sp. Act March 30, 1878 (St. 1877–78, p. 752), creating the Courthouse school district of Sonoma county, was not inhibited by Const. art. 11, § 6, prohibiting the creation by special laws of corporations for municipal purposes, and providing for the incorporation, organization, and classification, in proportion to population, of cities and towns, by general laws; the term "corporations for municipal purposes" being limited to cities and towns, and the school district being neither a city or town, nor a municipal corporation, in the general sense, though Const. art. 4, § 30, provides that "neither the Legislature nor any county, city, township, school district, or other municipal corporation shall make," etc.; a school district being classified with the county, which is not a municipal corporation within Const. art. 11, § 6, and the school district being a political division of the county under the supervision of the local authorities for the promotion of the general educational purposes of the state; the system being a matter of general concern and not a municipal affair.

3. Statutes ⇐76(1)—Repeal of act creating school district held not in conflict with constitutional prohibition of special legislation, where general law can be made applicable.

Act May 2, 1919 (St. 1919, p. 239), repealing Sp. Act March 30, 1878 (St. 1877–78, p. 752), creating a school district, is not in conflict with Const. art. 4, § 25, subd. 33, prohibiting the passing of special laws in cases where a general law can be made applicable; such provision against special legislation containing no restrictions in terms against repeal, and not prohibiting the repeal, where the effect is merely to withdraw from the operation of the special law and make subject to the general law.

4. Schools and school districts ⇐22—Act repealing special act creating school district held not in conflict with constitutional requirement of a system of common schools.

Act May 2, 1919 (St. 1919, p. 239), repealing Sp. Act March 30, 1878 (St. 1877–78, p. 752), creating a school district, is not in conflict with Const. art. 9, § 5, requiring the creation of a system of common schools by which a free school shall be kept up and supported in each district at least six months a year; the effect being merely to withdraw from the operation of the special law and make subject to the general law, and not interfering with, but promoting, the constitutional scheme for a general educational system.

5. Schools and school districts ⇐22—Repeal of act creating district embracing city and adjacent territory held not to violate public policy.

The repeal by Act May 2, 1919 (St. 1919, p. 239) of Sp. Act March 30, 1878 (St. 1877–78, p. 752), creating a school district embracing the area of a subsequently incorporated city and some adjacent territory, was not in violation of public policy, in that it leaves the outlying territory without an organization as a district; Pol. Code, § 1576, immediately becoming operative, creating a district with boundaries coextensive with the city's limits and leaving the outlying territory subject to the authority of the board of supervisors as provided in subdivision 2 of section 4041; the court assuming that proper action was taken and a new district formed of the outlying territory, any delay and inconvenience caused by the necessity for readjustment being considerations for the cognizance of the Legislature alone.

6. Schools and school districts ⊜22—Validity of repeal of special act creating district held not affected by curative acts.

The validity of Act May 2, 1919 (St. 1919, p. 239), repealing Sp. Act March 30, 1878 (St. 1877–78, p. 752), creating a district, is not affected by Pol. Code, § 1724, or Act March 18, 1905 (St. 1905, p. 243), curing irregularities in formation of such districts theretofore organized, but not creating any district or affecting the repeal of any special statutes.

7. Appeal and error ⊜907(2)—In view of presumption failure to find on special defenses not available, where evidence not in record.

In an action to oust the trustees of a school district claimed to have been abolished by the repeal of the special act creating it, where the court's findings were sufficient to support the judgment for plaintiffs, its failure to find on certain special defenses set up in defendant's answer is of no avail, where the evidence was not brought up; the presumption being that such evidence was opposed to said allegations.

8. Constitutional law ⊜48—Statutes declared unconstitutional only where plainly and palpably so.

A court must move with great caution in declaring an act of the Legislature unconstitutional, resolve all doubts in favor of its validity, and hold it unconstitutional only where it is plainly and palpably violative of the Constitution.

Appeal from Superior Court, Sonoma County; George H. Thompson, Judge.

Quo warranto by the People of the State of California, on the relation of J. C. Williamson and others, against John Rinner and others. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendants appeal. Affirmed.

G. W. Hoyle, of Santa Rosa, for appellants.

Carl Barnard, of Santa Rosa, U. S. Webb, Atty. Gen., and Russell P. Tyler, of San Francisco, for respondents.

BURNETT, J. The appeal is from a judgment in favor of the plaintiffs. The action was in quo warranto to have it adjudged that defendants were usurping and improperly exrcising the office of trustees of Courthouse school district in the county of Sonoma. This district was created by a special act of the Legislature in 1878 (St. 1877–78, p. 752), and embraced what now constitutes the city of Santa Rosa and some adjacent territory outside the corporate limits thereof. In 1919 (St. 1919, p. 239), the Legislature repealed the said act of 1878 creating said district. At the time of said repeal and for some time prior thereto the defendants were the duly acting and qualified trustees of the said Courthouse school district, and they claim that their right to said office has not been affected, for the reason that said attempted repeal of said act of 1878 was and is invalid. As to this vital consideration the court's finding is:

"That it is true that the act of the Legislature of 1919 of the state of California, approved May 5, 1919, which repealed the said act of the Legislature of the state of California of 1878, approved March 30, 1878, is now and at the time of the filing of the complaint in this action was in full force and effect, and it is true that the said Courthouse school district, county of Sonoma, ceased to exist after the taking effect of the said act of the Legislature of 1919, repealing the said act of the Legislature of 1878."

[1] In the determination of the validity of said repeal act the plenary power of the Legislature, where not circumscribed by the Constitution, must, of course, be regarded. The principle is not disputed that there is no implication of the absence or nonexistence of legislative authority or power, and that whoever would claim that the power in any instance does not exist must point out the provision of the Constitution which has taken it away or forbidden its exercise. In re Madera Irrigation District, 92 Cal. 296, 28 Pac. 272, 675, 14 L. R. A. 755, 27 Am. St. Rep. 106; Sheehan v. Scott, 145 Cal. 684, 79 Pac. 350.

This follows, from the provision of the Constitution itself (article 4, § 1) that "the legislative power of this state shall be vested in a Senate and Assembly which shall be designated 'the Legislature of the state of California,'" and from the application of the admitted principle that "the Constitution is not to be considered as a grant of power, but rather as a restriction upon the powers of the Legislature." Of course, we are not concerned herein with the reservation by the people of the authority embraced in the initiative and referendum, but, concededly, said act of repeal must be rendered effective unless inhibited by some express provision of the Constitution, or unless manifestly against sound public policy.

[2] The only provision which is invoked as so operative is section 6, art. 11, providing:

"Corporations for municipal purposes shall not be created by special laws; but the Legislature shall, by general laws, provide for the incorporation, organization, and classification in proportion to population, of cities and towns, which laws may be altered, amended, or repealed. * * * Cities and towns heretofore organized or incorporated may become organized under the general laws passed for that purpose, whenever a majority of the electors voting at a general election shall so determine, and shall organize in conformity therewith. Cities and towns hereafter organized under charters framed and adopted by authority of this Constitution are hereby empowered, and cities and towns heretofore organized by authority of this Constitution may amend their charters in the manner authorized by this Constitution so as to become likewise empowered hereunder to make and enforce all laws and regulations in respect to municipal affairs, subject only to the restrictions and limitations provided in their several charters, and in respect to other matters they shall be subject to and controlled by general laws."

No extended consideration of this provision is required since the language is simple and perspicuous and its interpretation has been the subject of discussion in many decisions of the appellate courts of the state. It may be remarked, however, that it would seem to be an unnatural and strained construction to hold that it has any application whatever to a school district.

If it might be said that a school district is a "corporation for municipal purposes," and therefore subject to the first clause of said provision, it is doubtful whether it would be of any avail to appellants. The primary and direct object of the act of repeal was, not to create a district, but to dissolve and terminate it. The district having been created by the act of 1878, when special laws were not prohibited by the Constitution, the act in controversy releases said district from the operation and effect of a special law and makes it subject to the general law. It must be admitted, though, that, in consequence of subjecting said territory to the operation of the general law, said repeal results indirectly in the creation of the two districts where one existed before and there is force in the contention of appellants that said repeal does, in effect, create a new district

However, this point is not necessary to the decision, as it is apparent that in said provision the people have clearly limited the term "corporations for municipal purposes" to those relating to and included in "cities and towns," and it would not be claimed, of course, that Courthouse school district is a city or town, although it does include the city of Santa Rosa. The school district is admittedly a totally distinct entity from the municipal corporation of Santa Rosa. Manifestly, the residue of said provision can afford appellant no comfort, since it is clearly confined to "cities and towns heretofore organized," etc., and "cities and towns heretofore and hereafter organized."

The authorities cited by appellants have reference to an entirely different situation, as will readily be appreciated. In Desmond v. Dunn, 55 Cal. 242, the question was whether the so-called McClure Charter for the city and county of San Francisco was constitutional and operative. Donahue v. Graham, 61 Cal. 276, involved the validity of the act of April 1, 1872, relating to street improvements in San Francisco. Ex parte Helm, 143 Cal. 553, 77 Pac. 453, had to do with a license tax imposed by the town of Santa Clara. These cases and some others that are cited in the brief of appellants involved directly the construction of said constitutional provision, but, for the reason before stated, they are hardly in point here. As stated by the learned trial judge in his opinion filed in the case:

"Obviously, the Courthouse school district was not a 'city' or a 'town'; consequently it did not come within the specific provisions of said section for reorganization of towns and cities under the general law."

Moreover, if we disregard the apparently strict limitation of said provision to "cities and towns," and by judicial construction stretch the language so as to include all municipal corporations, or corporations for municipal purposes, we shall fall short of meeting appellants' necessities. This follows for the reason that a school district is not, strictly speaking, a municipal corporation. It is true that for certain purposes in some decisions a school district has been considered as constituting a municipal corporation, as in Horton v. Mobile School Commissioners, 43 Ala. 598, and Curry v. District Township of Sioux City, 62 Iowa, 102, 17 N. W. 191. It is claimed also by appellants that a school district is so recognized in section 30, art. 4, of our Constitution, providing that "neither the Legislature, nor any county, city and county, township, school district, or other municipal corporation shall ever make," etc. This contention hinges manifestly upon the use of the word "other." As to this, though, it may be stated that a school district is classified with a county, and it has been expressly held in this state that a county is not a municipal corporation within the meaning of section 6 of article 11 of the Constitution. People v. McFadden, 81 Cal. 489, 22 Pac. 851, 15 Am. St. Rep. 66; Kahn v. Sutro, 114 Cal. 316, 46 Pac. 87, 33 L. R. A. 620; County of San Mateo v. Coburn, 130 Cal. 632, 63 Pac. 78, 621.

The weight of authority is, indeed, to the effect that a school district is not a municipal corporation. In section 22 of Dillon on Municipal Corporations it is said:

"Corporations intended to assist in the conduct of local civil government are sometimes styled political, sometimes public, sometimes civil, sometimes municipal, and certain kinds of them with very restricted powers quasi corporation—all these by way of distinction from private corporations. All corporations intended as agencies in the administration of civil government are public, as distinguished from private corporations. Thus an incorporated school district, or county, as well as city, is a public corporation; but the school district or county, properly speaking, is not, while the city is, a municipal corporation."

The school district is a necessary political division of the county under the direction and supervision of the local authorities for the promotion of the general educational purposes of the state; the system being a matter of general concern and "not a municipal affair." Hancock v. Board of Education, 140 Cal. 554, 74 Pac. 44; Malaley v. City of Marysville, 37 Cal. App. 638, 174 Pac. 367. However, as before stated, this question is not of decisive moment herein.

[3, 4] We can see no merit in the claim of appellants that said repeal is in conflict with subdivision 33, § 25, art. 4, or section 5, art. 9, of the Constitution. The first of these provides:

"The Legislature shall not pass local or special laws in any of the following enumerated cases, that is to say: * * * Thirty-third—In all other cases where a general law can be made applicable."

The latter is:

"The Legislature shall provide for a system of common schools, by which a free school shall be kept up and supported in each district at least six months in every year, after the first year in which a school has been established."

The contention of appellants based upon these constitutional provisions is completely answered by the suggestion of the trial judge "that we are dealing with a repeal, not with any creative act, or with any amended act; and that the said provisions of the Constitution contain no restriction in terms against repeal." In his opinion attention is called to State v. Prather, 84 Kan. 169, 112 Pac. 829, 36 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1084, wherein it is said:

"The adoption of a constitutional provision against special legislation does not prevent the repeal by special act of a special law previously enacted, or its partial repeal, where the effect is merely to withdraw a county from the operation of the special law and make it subject to the general law."

People ex rel. Rogerson v. Crawley, 274 Ill. 139, 113 N. E. 119, involved the validity of the repeal of the charter of the city of Jacksonville, and the court held that it was not violative of the Constitution, art. 4, § 22, providing that—

"The General Assembly shall not pass local or special laws for incorporating cities, towns, or villages, or changing or amending the charters of any city, town, or village, and providing for the management of common schools, since it is the substance and not the form that determines the constitutionality of an enactment, and the special purpose of the provision was to discourage dissimilarity and to promote and encourage legislation uniform on all subjects referred to, and the act tends to promote uniformity in the organization of incorporated cities and in the management of their schools."

In that case the court issued a writ of mandate requiring the defendants to organize under the general law the school district that had been released from the provisions of the special statute.

A Michigan case in line with the foregoing is Attorney General ex rel. Kies v. Lowrey, 131 Mich. 639, 92 N. W. 289. Therein the Legislature consolidated into one school district lands which had been previously divided among several, the said new district not including all the lands comprised in the several districts from which it was organized; and the act further provided (among other things) that the school inspectors of the township should attach to other school districts the portions of the several districts not included in the new. It was held by the Supreme Court that the act did not violate the constitutional provision requiring the Legislature "to provide for and establish a system of primary schools, whereby a school shall be kept without charge for tuition at least three months in each year in every school district in the state."

In discussing the validity of certain legislative acts repealing the charter of the city of Memphis, the Supreme Court of Tennessee, in Luehrman v. Taxing Dist., 2 Lea (Tenn.) 425, said:

"The prohibition of the Constitution is against the creation or the increase or diminution of the powers of a corporation by special law, and the direction is to provide by general laws 'for the organization of all corporations hereafter created.'"

But it was declared that this did not prohibit the Legislature—

"from repealing, at any time, the corporate privileges of a particular community, whether organized previous or subsequent to the adoption of the Constitution. This is a power so essential to sovereignty and the preservation by the state of its control over its instrumentalities of local rule that it cannot well be considered as cut off except by a positive provision to that effect. The restriction is against the powers * * * being 'diminished' by special laws, not against their entire abolishment."

To the same effect are other cases cited by respondents, among them being State ex rel. Worthley v. Steen, 43 N. J. Law, 542; Central, etc., Co. v. City, 23 Tex. Civ. App. 390, 57 S. W. 982; City v. State (Tex. Civ. App.) 77 S. W. 24; Mayor, etc., of South Morgantown v. City, 49 W. Va. 729, 40 S. E. 15.

It is indeed quite apparent that the repeal of a special act creating a school district and thus making it subject to the general law on that subject not only does not interfere with but it tends to promote the constitutional scheme for a general educational system. It is likewise apparent that it would be impracticable, if not impossible, by means of a general law to accomplish the purpose that the Legislature had in view in enacting said repeal. If it had been desired to repeal all special laws creating school districts, a general law might have been "applicable," but the repeal of one act creating one district necessarily excludes the consideration of a general law.

The cases cited by appellants, as we understand them, are not opposed to the foregoing views. People v. Common Council, 85 Cal. 369, 24 Pac. 727, involved the construction of an act relating to the city of San Diego. Moreover, it was not a repeal but an amendment to a statute, and it operated to take away from said city the territory embraced in Coronado Beach. By said amendment the Legislature plainly violated the letter and spirit of said constitutional provision.

In Kennedy v. Miller, 97 Cal. 429, 32 Pac. 558, the question was whether the city treasurer of the city of San Diego was entitled to the custody of certain moneys that had been apportioned by the county superintendent of schools to the school district of said city. In holding that the county treasurer was entitled to the custody of said funds the Supreme Court held that "the city is a corporation distinct from that of the school district, even though both are designated by the same name, and embrace the same territory," and that the general school law passed by the Legislature for the establishment and maintenance of one system of public schools governed the situation instead of the provisions in the freeholders' charter adopted by said city. The decision is strictly in accordance with the contention of respondents herein.

In Platt v. City and County, 158 Cal. 74, 110 Pac. 304, the question was as to the validity of the issuance of bonds by the city and county of San Francisco for the construction and completion of certain proposed municipally owned street railways. The opinion embraces a learned and comprehensive discussion of certain provisions of the Constitution relating to the powers and forms of government of the municipalities of the state, but it has no particular bearing upon the controversy herein.

The vital point decided in Las Animas, etc., Land Co. v. Preciado, 167 Cal. 580, 140 Pac. 239, was that, when a county was divided so that part of an existing school district fell in the new county, the board of supervisors of the new county was without authority to order the annexation of that portion of the district to one of its own districts; the Supreme Court holding that the situation was covered and controlled by a general law passed by the Legislature.

[5] Equally without merit is, in our opinion, the claim that said repealing act is in violation of the public policy of the state, in that it leaves the outlying territory without any legal status as a school district. It is no doubt true, as stated in Smith v. S. F. & N. P. Ry. Co., 115 Cal. 584, 47 Pac. 582, 35 L. R. A. 309, 56 Am. St. Rep. 119, that—

"'Public policy' is a term of vague and uncertain meaning, which it pertains to the lawmaking power to define, and courts are apt to encroach upon the domain of that branch of the government if they characterize a transaction as invalid because it is contrary to public policy, unless the transaction contravenes some positive statute or some well-established rule of law."

Herein, there has been no such violation. It is true that by the repeal of said act the outlying territory was left without an organization as a school district and it became, according to appellants' designation, "no man's land." The general law, however, immediately became operative, creating Santa Rosa school district with boundaries coextensive with the city limits (section 1576, Pol. Code) and leaving the outlying territory subject to the authority of the board of supervisors as provided in subdivision 2 of section 4041 of the Political Code. We must assume that proper action has been taken and a new district formed of the outlying territory, affording necessary school facilities for the children residing therein. It may be that some delay and inconvenience have been caused by the necessity for a readjustment, but such considerations are matters for the cognizance of the Legislature alone. It was for that tribunal to determine whether it was in the interest of the public welfare to make this territory subject to the general law. The reasons which prompted the desire to make the territory of the city of Santa Rosa to constitute the boundaries of one district to the exclusion of the outside land were no doubt considered adequate, but, at any rate, we cannot say that the Legislature violated any law or exceeded its authority in effecting the repeal.

Some questions as to the division of property and payment of bonded indebtedness are suggested by appellants. But we do not think they are involved in this litigation, and, if any controversy concerning them should arise, they will probably be solved without the difficulty now apprehended by appellants.

[6] The problem, in our judgment, is not complicated by section 1724 of the Political Code or by the act of the Legislature entitled "An act confirming the organization of school districts," approved March 18, 1905 (Stats. of 1905, p. 243). These are curative acts; the former applying to high schools and the latter to common schools. They cure only irregularities in the formation of the districts which were organized prior to said enactments, and in no manner do they create any school district or affect the repeal of any special statutes. The scope and significance of such legislation are determined in Board of Education v. Hyatt, 152 Cal. 519, 93 Pac. 117;

Wood v. County of Calaveras, 164 Cal. 405, 129 Pac. 283; People v. Van Nuys, 173 Cal. 797, 162 Pac. 97, Ann. Cas. 1918D, 255.

[7] Appellants complain that the court failed to find upon certain special defenses set up in the answer. But since the findings are sufficient to support the judgment, the contention can be of no avail, as the evidence is not brought up. The presumption would be that the evidence was all opposed to said allegations, and the corresponding findings upon said defenses would necessarily have been against appellants. In this view they have suffered no prejudice. However, the truth is that said special defenses contain only immaterial facts, conclusions of law, and facts covered by the actual findings of the court. It seems unnecessary to exhibit them fully, but we content ourselves with a recital of paragraph 8 of the answer, as follows:

"As a further and separate defense to plaintiff's complaint and petition defendants and each and all of them aver and allege that if the repealing act of 1919 referred to in plaintiff's complaint and petition is to be construed as contended for by plaintiffs, then the said repealing act is unconstitutional in this, that section 6 of article 11 of the Constitution of the state of California prohibits the creation by special act of a municipal corporation, which Courthouse school district is in the sense that it operates governmentally and exercises certain state sovereignty which has been delegated to it by the state itself, and if it is unconstitutional to create a municipal corporation by a special act it is likewise unconstitutional to abolish a municipal corporation by a special act."

It is apparent that the foregoing presents an important question of law and an interesting legal argument, but it tenders no issuable fact.

[8] In view of the well-settled principle announced by the authorities, that "a court must move with great caution in declaring an act of the Legislature unconstitutional, resolve all doubt in favor of its validity, and hold it unconstitutional only in cases where the act is plainly and palpably violative of the Constitution," we do not feel warranted in disturbing the conclusion of the trial court.

The judgment is affirmed.

We concur: FINCH, P. J.; HART, J.

52 Cal. App. 352

McAULIFFE v. McAULIFFE. (Civ. 3867.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. June 29, 1921.)

1. Husband and wife ⟸298½—Finding as to property unnecessary, after finding against right to separate maintenance.

After the court found that plaintiff's allegations as to defendant's cruelty were untrue, so that she was not entitled to separate support and maintenance, the issue as to the community property of the parties became immaterial, and no finding was required thereon.

2. Husband and wife ⟸298½—Finding allegations of cruelty were not true is sufficient in form.

In an action for separate maintenance, a finding by the trial court that the allegations of the complaint with reference to the alleged acts of cruelty by defendant were not true, and have not been sustained by sufficient evidence, leaves no doubt that the trial court found defendant not guilty of cruelty, and is sufficient in form.

3. Trial ⟸395(1), 404(1) — Negative pregnant in finding not fatal, as findings must be construed to uphold judgment.

The findings of the trial court are not, like the pleadings of the parties, to be deemed insufficient because they contain a negative pregnant, since the findings are to be construed so as to uphold the judgment, if they are reasonably susceptible of such construction.

4. Husband and wife ⟸300—Award of children not disturbed on appeal, when not shown to be abuse of discretion.

In an action for separate maintenance, where the husband filed cross-complaint for divorce, a decree, denying the relief asked by both parties because their respective allegations of cruelty by the other were not sustained, but awarding to the plaintiff custody of the youngest child only, and to the defendant the custody of the other two children, is not shown to be an abuse of discretion, where the trial court, in course of the introduction of considerable testimony on the issue of custody, had opportunity to observe the character and qualities of the respective parties bearing upon their fitness to have such custody.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Mateo County; George H. Buck, Judge.

Action by Margaret McAuliffe against George J. McAuliffe, for permanent support and maintenance, in which defendant presented a cross-complaint for divorce. From a judgment denying the prayers of both complaint and cross-complaint and awarding the custody of the youngest child to plaintiff and of the two older children to defendant, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Joseph B. Gordon, of San Mateo, and Stanislaus A. Riley, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Joseph J. Bullock, of Redwood City, and Joseph L. Taaffe, of San Francisco, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. The plaintiff commenced this action against the defendant, her husband, for permanent support and maintenance, alleging extreme cruelty on his part as the basis of the action, and praying for alimony, the custody of the children, and for an award to herself of the community property as described in her complaint. The defendant answered said complaint, denying its averments as to his cruelty, and also making certain admissions and denials as to the community property. Later the defendant presented a cross-complaint for divorce, averring cruelty on the part of the plaintiff, and also setting forth certain grounds for an award of the custody of the children of the marriage to himself. To this cross-complaint the plaintiff filed her answer, and upon the issues as thus made up the cause proceeded to trial.

The trial court found against the plaintiff upon her averments as to the defendant's cruelty, and also found against the defendant upon his averments of the plaintiff's cruelty as set forth in his cross-complaint; and it accordingly denied both the plaintiff's prayer for separate maintenance for herself and the defendant's prayer for a divorce.

The trial court made no finding or award upon the subject of the community property of the parties, but as to the three children of the marriage it awarded the care and custody of the youngest child, a daughter, aged three years, to the plaintiff, and awarded the care and custody of the other two children, a daughter aged seven and a son aged five years, to the defendant. The court also directed the defendant to pay the plaintiff the sum of $25 a month for the support of the child awarded to her. From the interlocutory decree entered in accord with these findings the plaintiff prosecutes this appeal.

The appellant's first contention is that said judgment must be reversed upon appeal for the reason that the trial court failed to make any finding upon the issue as to the community property.

[1] This contention has no merit for the reason that when the trial court found that the plaintiff's allegations as to the defendant's cruelty were untrue, and that she was not entitled to separate support and maintenance, such finding rendered the issue as to the community property of the parties an immaterial issue in the case, and hence one upon which no finding was required. The case of O'Brien v. O'Brien, 124 Cal. 422, 57 Pac. 225, cited by the appellant as supporting her contention, has no application, since in that case the court points out that the question of alimony remained a material issue in the case, upon which of course the trial court was bound to make a finding. On the other hand, the cases of Baker v. Baker, 168 Cal. 346, 143 Pac. 607, Ann. Cas. 1916A, 854, and Zihn v. Zihn, 153 Cal. 405, 95 Pac. 868, are authority for the proposition that the trial court is not required to make findings upon matters which have become immaterial issues in the case.

[2] The appellant's next contention is that the findings of the trial court are insufficient in form to support its judgment. The particular finding attacked is in the following words:

"The court finds that all the allegations of plaintiff's complaint having reference to the alleged acts of cruelty alleged therein to have been inflicted upon plaintiff by defendant, as a cause for the separation of plaintiff from defendant, were not true, and have not been sustained by sufficient evidence."

The appellant's criticism of the foregoing finding is based upon the cases of Krug v. F. A. Lux Brewing Co., 129 Cal. 322, 61 Pac. 1125; Harlan v. Ely, 55 Cal. 340, Bank of Woodland v. Treadwell, 55 Cal. 379, and Ladd v. Tully, 51 Cal. 277, but a cursory examination of each one of these cases will disclose a most material difference between the finding criticized in each of them and the finding assailed in the case at bar, since in each of these cases the defect in the finding was that it left in doubt what facts the court found to be true or untrue; while in the finding assailed in the instant case there is no such doubt or confusion, since the trial court has expressly found that all of the plaintiff's allegations upon the subject of the defendant's cruelty are untrue. This finding we think sufficient under the authority of Continental B. & L. Ass'n v. Wilson, 144 Cal. 776, 78 Pac. 254; Williams v. Hall, 79 Cal. 606, 21 Pac. 965.

[3] The further criticism of said finding by the appellant upon the ground that it presents a negative pregnant is also without merit, since the logical defect of a negative pregnant as applied to legal matters has reference to pleading, not to findings, which are to be construed so as to uphold the judgment if they are reasonably susceptible of such a construction. Baker v. Eilers Music Co., 26 Cal. App. 371, 146 Pac. 1056.

The appellant's next contention seems to be that the trial court in finding against the plaintiff upon the issue of the defendant's cruelty as the foundation of her action for separate maintenance, did so upon the mistaken idea that her testimony in that regard required corroboration as in an action for divorce. This, however, is a man of straw, since the findings nowhere disclose that the court was possessed of this notion. On the contrary, the court's finding is susceptible of the construction that the plaintiff failed to make out a case of cruelty as against the defendant's proofs in that regard.

[4] The appellant's final contention is that the distribution of the children of the marriage between the parties is indefensible, in view of the court's findings and of the evidence in the case. We cannot agree with this contention, for while it is true that the court did find that the defendant's averments as to the plaintiff's neglect of the children were not sustained by the evidence, it is also true that there was considerable testimony presented pro and con upon these issues, in the course of which the trial court had abundant opportunity to observe the character and qualities of the respective parties bearing directly upon the fitness of each to have the custody of their offspring. These facts, when taken in connection with the very wide discretion with which trial courts are invested in dealing with the custody of the minor children of discordant parents, lead us to the conclusion that the trial court has not been shown to have committed any error or abuse of discretion in its award of the children in the instant case. Jones v. Jones, 192 Pac. 867.

The judgment is affirmed.

52 Cal. App. 662

MILLER v. LERDO LAND CO. (Civ. 3474.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. May 19, 1921. Rehearing Denied June 17, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court July 18, 1921.)

1. Brokers ⟸11—Agreement held to contemplate that water be furnished land before sale.

In an action by a broker to recover damages for breach of sale contract, held, that contract contemplated that landowner should bore wells and construct ditches for purposes of irrigation as rapidly as reasonably possible and before the land was sold.

2. Brokers ⟸71—Broker held entitled under contract to interest on deferred payments.

Under a brokerage contract under which broker was to receive a certain per cent. of installments in certain cases, held, that the broker was to share in interest received on deferred payments.

3. Appeal and error ⟸1011(1)—Findings based on conflicting evidence sustained.

Findings of trial court will be sustained on appeal if there is in the record evidence substantially tending to support the same, even though there may be strong conflicting evidence.

4. Brokers ⟸11—Landowner held required to furnish water for land sold.

In an action by broker for breach of contract concerning sale of irrigated lands, contract held to require landowner to construct ditches capable of carrying to the several tracts of land the amount of water necessary for irrigation, and distribution of the water was to continue until transferred to a mutual water company.

12. Brokers 11—Evidence held to sustain finding that landowner failed to furnish water as agreed.

In an action by a broker for breach of contract concerning sale of lands in parcels to be irrigated, evidence held to support a finding that landowner failed to furnish water in accordance with the contract.

6. Brokers ⟸64(1)—Agent not to be deprived of compensation because deferred payments are not made by purchaser procured or other terms not carried out.

Unless there is a provision in the contract to the contrary, a real estate agent employed to negotiate a sale of land earns his commission, and it is payable when he produces within the time allowed a purchaser who is ready, willing, and able to take the property on the terms prescribed or with whom the owner enters into a contract on these or other terms satisfactory to him, and the agent cannot be deprived of the agreed compensation because deferred payments are not made by the purchaser or because other terms of the contract are not carried out.

7. Brokers ⟸40—Contract may make payment of commission dependent on any lawful condition.

The parties to an agency contract may make the payment of commission dependent on any lawful condition as on completed sale or out of installments as paid.

8. Brokers ⟸11—Where principal does not comply with contract with broker and purchaser fails to complete payments broker held entitled to commissions on deferred payments.

When landowner does not comply with the terms of his contract with broker, and as a result thereof the purchaser fails to complete his payments, broker is nevertheless entitled to commissions which were to be paid out of the deferred purchase money of the land so bought.

9. Brokers ⟸11—Items of damage held not supported by evidence.

In an action by a broker employed to sell irrigated lands in parcels to recover damages consisting of percentage of deferred payments by purchasers who had forfeited their contracts by reason of defendant's failure to comply with its brokerage contract in respect to furnishing of water, held, that many items of awards of damages were not sustained by the evidence.

10. Brokers ⟸11—Finding of damages held not sustained by evidence.

In an action by a broker to recover damages resulting from defendant's failure to develop and distribute water necessary for the irrigation of the land in question, evidence concerning four sales of land which fell through by reason of defendant's breach held insufficient to show that defendant's breach was the sole cause of the sales not being consummated.

11. Brokers ⟸11—Evidence held to sustain finding that plaintiff furnished buyers ready, able, and willing.

In an action by a broker for damages for breach of contract, evidence held to sustain a finding that plaintiff furnished certain persons who were ready, able, and willing to buy parcels of the land in question on terms in conformity with agreement between plaintiff and defendant.

12. Brokers ⇐11—Evidence held to sustain finding that all land would have been sold.

In an action by a broker employed to sell a tract of land in parcels to recover damages for breach of contract to furnish and distribute irrigated water, evidence held sufficient to sustain a finding that plaintiff would have sold all of the land except for defendant's breach.

13. Brokers ⇐11—Broker held entitled to recover for loss of prospective profits.

A broker who agreed to conduct a campaign for and the business of selling defendant's tract of land in parcels to the end that the same should be sold in the shortest possible time and agreed not to engage in the sale of other land subdivisions during the life of the agreement on breach of defendant's agreement to furnish water for irrigation was entitled to recover prospective profits.

14. Evidence ⇐142(1)—Sales of other lands held inadmissible to show plaintiff would have sold lands in question.

In an action by a broker to recover damages for breach of a contract respecting sale of tract of irrigated lands in parcels, evidence of sales made of land in other places in the valley at the period of time in question should have been rejected where offered to show that plaintiff would have sold the whole of the tract in question if defendant had not breached its contract as to furnishing and distributing water; the conditions being different.

15. Evidence ⇐486—Opinion evidence held improper as to value of exclusive agency in property.

Opinion evidence as to value of the exclusive agency contract and the profits which might have been made, or on the amount of business it might have done under the agency if it had not been wrongfully terminated, is not admissible, since such opinion would be purely speculative and conjectural.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; G. W. Nicol, Judge.

Action by C. E. Miller against the Lerdo Land Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed in the District Court of Appeals, and hearing denied in Supreme Court.

Thomas C. Job and Merserve & Meserve, all of Los Angeles (Earl T. Miller, of Los Angeles, of counsel), for appellant.

Valentine & Newby and Nathan Newby, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. This is an action to recover damages for the breach of a contract in writing dated October 2, 1912, wherein appellant, as party of the first part, gave and granted to respondent, as party of the second part, the exclusive right, subject to the conditions and limitations therein stated, to sell and dispose of, as agent for the first party, the lands known as the "Lerdo tract," situated in the county of Kern, state of California, and said to contain 6,481.03 acres of land. Judgment having been entered in favor of the plaintiff, the defendant appeals therefrom.

The lands of the Lerdo tract were so situated and of such character that without irrigation they were valueless for agricultural purposes. The parties to the contract believed, and they framed their contract upon that theory, that a supply of water could be developed on the land sufficient to furnish and supply 50 miner's inches for each 160 acres thereof, and that this would be sufficient for the purposes intended. Generally speaking, respondent agreed to sell the land for appellant, and appellant agreed to make the subdivision and provide the water supply. The controversy between the parties herein, as to the actual facts rests chiefly upon respondent's claim that appellant agreed both to develop and to distribute a stipulated amount of water to each 20-acre tract, and that appellant failed to comply with this agreement and also repudiated the contract, and caused it to be understood in the vicinity where the land was located that no further development would be made, and that the selling campaign of respondent under his contract had been terminated, and that no further sales would be made, and thereby made is impossible for respondent to complete the sale of the land described in his contract; that otherwise respondent could and would have sold all of the land within the stipulated time.

There are two counts in the complaint. The first count contains demands for special damages and a demand for general damages. By the second count respondent sought to recover the proportion which he claims became due to him out of moneys received by appellant on deferred payments made to appellant by purchasers and for which appellant has not accounted to respondent. The judgment entered in favor of respondent awarded general damages in the sum of $107,928.93, and special damages in the aggregate sum of $53,479.10, under the first cause of action, and $1,890.87 under the second cause of action, making a total of $163,298.90, besides costs.

Appellant contends that the court erred in overruling its demurrer to the complaint. The grounds of demurrer were that the complaint did not, nor did either count thereof, state a cause of action against the defendant; that in the first count several causes of action were joined, but not separately stated; that upon the second count several causes of action were joined, but not separately stated; that each count was uncertain in stated particulars; and that each count, for like reasons, was ambiguous and was unintelligible.

[1] In the argument upon the general demurrer to the first cause of action counsel for appellant depended principally upon certain interpretations which they say should be given to the contract. These points are: (a) That under the terms of the contract appellant's obligations to respondent were to bore wells with reasonable diligence, at reasonable cost, and, when a well was bored, that well was to be tested, accepted in writing by respondent, and the lands to be irrigated therefrom declared, and that then, and not until then, was appellant under any obligation to respondent to sign any contracts of sale; (b) that the contract did not obligate appellant to construct any ditches or to deliver any water from the wells to any tract of land, or to do anything in the way of development of water other than "as needed in order to supply the lands sold with water for irrigation"; (c) that, under the proposed contracts to purchasers, respondent was to be under no obligation for delivery of water to the purchaser until the time when a conveyance was to be made; (d) that the contract did not comtemplate that appellant should be called upon to execute contracts of sale to purchasers until the water for those lands had been provided in the manner stated in the contract. With these suggested views of the meaning of the contract we do not agree. Throughout the contract it appears that the land could not and it was not expected that it would be sold without actually supplying water to each tract. Manifestly this was to be done by appellant. Necessarily this included ditches or other conduits adequate to bring the required amount of water to each purchaser's land. It was provided in the contract that this work was to be done "as rapidly as reasonably possible and as needed in order to supply the land sold with water for irrigation." The supply was to be "sufficient to furnish and supply 50 miner's inches for each 160 acres of said lands." This furnished a basis for computation of the quantity of water to which each tract sold would be entitled. Time, amounting to several years, was to be allowed to the purchasers to complete their payments. Nevertheless it was provided that the purchaser must agree that during the first and each succeeding year of his contract until at least one-half of the purchase price was paid he would cultivate and irrigate not less than one-half of the land agreed to be purchased by him. Clearly he could not comply with such proposed agreement unless the water was brought to his land promptly after the making of such contract. It was further provided in the contract between respondent and appellant that purchasers of land should be "entitled to the use of water thereon from the time of purchasing or agreeing to purchase the same," and should pay assessments for the use of the water. It was further agreed that respondent would "immediately enter upon a campaign for and the business of selling the land and property hereinabove described, to the end that the same shall be sold and disposed of in the shortest possible time and at the best obtainable price under and in accordance with this agreement."

Replying to the contention that in the first cause of action several causes of action were joined, but not separately stated, respondent says that the so-called separate causes of action, other than that calling for damages for breach of the entire contract, were in the nature of special damages for particular consequences, substantially growing out of the same breach of contract. This we believe to be a correct construction of the pleading.

[2] Concerning the questions raised by demurrer to the second count of the complaint, the only one which seems to require special attention relates to respondent's demand for a share of the money received by the Lerdo Land Company as interest on deferred payments made by purchasers of some of these tracts of land. It was provided in the contract:

> That (except as to the town site) the sales prices in the subdivision should be at least $150 per acre; that "the second party is to receive $50 of said purchase price of $150 per acre, in full compensation for all of his commission, labor, services, and expenditures made under or in connection with this agreement, and $100 per acre is to belong to and be retained by the first party. If any of said land is sold for a price in excess of $150 per acre, then as to such excess the same is to be equally divided between the parties of the first and second parts. Where the initial payment does not exceed 25 per cent. of the purchase price, all of such amount received shall be retained by the second party, and as to all amounts received for initial payments in excess of 25 per cent., or payments thereafter received, such amounts shall be divided between the first and second parties pro rata, in proportion to their interests as herein agreed, until said second party is fully paid. The party of the second part is to receive such payments of commissions at the date of the execution and delivery of such contract of purchase, and at the date of the making of the initial payment, and the several succeeding payments as provided to be made in said contract of purchase, until such time as the party of the second part has received all amounts due under this agreement."

According to the terms of the contract, it seems to have been intended that respondent should have a direct interest in those sums collected by appellant as part of the purchase price of the land sold and that such direct interest should be measured in the proportion stated in the contract. We think that the language used is sufficient to imply that respondent should share in the interest received on such deferred payments as well as in the principal thereof.

[3] Very soon after the contract of October 2, 1912, was made, the Lerdo tract was subdivided and maps of the subdivision were recorded. In addition to the principal subdivision, the contract included two smaller areas which were designated subdivision B and subdivision C. The transactions which touch the merits of the action were those having relation to subdivision A. Certain wells were on the land at the time when the contract was made. The work of putting these wells into good condition was commenced by appellant, who also entered upon the work of drilling other wells. Appellant employed engineers under whose supervision ditch lines were laid out and ditches were prepared to carry water from some of these wells both to tracts which were sold by respondent and to other tracts the sale of which was intended. In pursuance of the terms of his agreement, respondent promptly entered upon its performance, inaugurated a vigorous selling campaign, and to that end employed a number of subagents, printed and circulated literature concerning the land, and advertised it extensively, and devoted his own time exclusively to the sale of the Lerdo tract in good faith and as required by the terms of the contract. In connection with these activities, respondent expended large sums of money which were necessary and proper in the fulfillment of his obligation to appellant. The court found that respondent duly performed the obligations imposed upon him by the contract until prevented from the performance thereof by appellant, and that from and including December, 1912, to and including April, 1913, plaintiff sold to bona fide purchasers 1,198.91 acres of the said Lerdo lands. Many of the purchasers entered into possession of the land covered by their contracts and attempted to raise crops thereon. In the spring of the year 1913, and especially during the month of May, the crops planted on some of these lands were seriously injured for want of irrigation. This caused dissatisfaction among the purchasers and interfered with the success of the enterprise in the matter of selling more land. The court further found that appellant neglected and refused to develop and distribute water to the land in the Lerdo tract as it had covenanted and agreed to do. The findings contain a statement outlining the particulars in which it was determined by the court that there was a failure to supply and distribute water in the manner and in the quantities provided for in the contract of respondent and appellant, and that this failure was due to the fault of appellant. It is one of the principal contentions of appellant that there is no evidence to sustain the findings in this matter of alleged failure in the development and distribution of water. The evidence on this subject is reviewed extensively in appellant's brief. It occupies many hundreds of pages of the printed record. Under the well-understood rule that the findings will be sustained if there is in the record evidence substantially tending to support the same, even though there may be strong conflicting evidence, it has been our duty to examine this record, not for the purpose of weighing the probabilities, but for the sole purpose of determining whether there is evidence which taken alone is sufficient to prove the facts found. In the summary contained at the end of their review of the evidence, counsel for appellant state their position to be: A. That the evidence shows that wells were drilled and equipped as rapidly as reasonably possible, and that more water was developed than required at all times. B. That the evidence shows that ditches were constructed carrying water to all of the lands sold as rapidly as reasonably possible, and that all of the purchasers received the contract amount of water except those in that district where the land was withdrawn because of the impossibility of developing water at reasonable expense; as to certain purchasers who testified that they did not receive sufficient water, that their lands were not properly leveled, so that, although the contract amount was delivered, sufficient water to make a crop was not, which resulted in the loss of crops in 1913, and this further resulted in the extension of time of payments required from purchasers, and the extension of Miller's contract. C. That, if the ditch system was not sufficient, this insufficiency grew out of something over which appellant had no control, to wit: (a) Ditches were constructed out of fresh, loose earth; (b) character of the soil was such as to make it impossible to construct sufficient ditches; (c) this fact was admitted by respondent by the request which he made for a cement pipe system, and certain land was actually withdrawn to sell to obtain the money with which to put in such a system.

[4] Subdivision A extends in a northwesterly direction for a distance of several miles. The Southern Pacific Railroad runs in the same direction through the subdivision, so that about one-fourth thereof is on the northerly side of the railroad. The town site of Lerdo was laid out in section 15, one of the north line of sections of subdivision A. On October 2, 1912, there were eight wells on this subdivision, which are known in the record as wells 1 to 8, inclusive. The wells drilled by appellant subsequent to the date of this contract are numbered 9 to 15. Most of the lands sold and for which irrigation was required in the spring of 1913 were in the central part and northerly half of the subdivision. In May, 1913, well No. 9 had been finished and equipped, and was producing 972 gallons per minute, which, according to appellant's estimate of 9 gallons per minute as representing one miner's inch of water, amounted to 108 inches. No. 10, when first put on the pump on April 19th, had "sanded up." According to some of the testimony, this had been unnecessarily permitted by neglect on the part of appellant. On May 16th pumping was resumed, and the well was then producing about 120 miner's inches of water. Of the old wells, the only substantial results then being obtained were through wells 2, 5, and 7, with a combined product of 3,900 gallons per minute, or about 433 miner's inches. These constituted the supply available at the wells to meet the demands for water to be used upon the lands sold by respondent. If this quantity of water, without excessive loss, had been delivered on those lands, it is improbable that there would have been any complaint of want of water for irrigation. Apparently the trouble consisted in the lack of sufficient means of distribution rather than in failure to develop an adequate amount of water for the then existing emergencies. The testimony shows that ditches were supplied from wells 9 and 10 leading to some of these sold lands. These ditches, however, were so constructed and in such condition that there was an excessive waste of water and that the water would often break through and run over land where it was not wanted. It had not been intended to supply water to the northerly part of the subdivision from wells 2, 5, and 7, but there was an old ditch extending from those wells toward this northern area, and an attempt was made to restore this ditch so as to carry more water to the area which was supposed to be under wells 9 and 10 and under other wells which were to be completed in that neighborhood. The last-mentioned ditch was likewise unfit to produce the desired result. In consequence of these conditions, the hemp, ramie, and grain of the purchasers who had attempted to raise those crops was burned up in the hot days of May and June, 1913. Appellant testified that in the early part of May, together with Mr. Wishon, the general manager of appellant company, and Mr. Balch, its president, he made a thorough survey and inspection of subdivision A to ascertain what would be the best method to settle with the purchasers who had been damaged on account of the water failure, and to ascertain what would be the best method of putting the Lerdo water in proper condition for future supply. According to this testimony, after a very full examination and discussion of the situation, Mr. Balch stated that he realized that they had not done on the subdivision the things which they ought to have done, and asked respondent to arrange for settlements with the purchasers. He said he would give them an extension of time, knock off their interest and water charges, and postpone their payments; "just tell them we are going to put concrete pipes on this land and put it in proper shape so the future will have nothing but success for these people." No cement ditches ever were constructed, and it is not claimed that the contract obligated appellant specifically to construct such ditches. If there was any such obligation, it could only be incidental to appellant's obligation to provide by some means a sufficient distribution of the agreed quantity of water for the tracts which it was proposed to sell. It was provided in the contract that "after the drilling and installation of the wells, and the construction of the ditches herein called for, and as herein agreed, and capable of producing the quantity of water required, the party of the first part shall be under no further liability or expense in connection with such wells or water system or the pumping or delivery of such water." This amounts to a direct agreement that the appellant would construct ditches capable of carrying to the several tracts of land the amount of water necessary for irrigation, not exceeding the defined quantity, as measured by the limit of 50 miner's inches for each 160 acres. The water was to be carried "to each 20-acre lot of said land." It was further provided in the contract that appellant would cause mutual water companies to be incorporated for the purposes of ownership and distribution of the water supply among the owners of the lands purchased from appellant, and would convey to the purchasers "said land when paid for, together with said water or shares of stock in the water company holding same, sufficient to give each buyer of land the supply of water above provided." The effect of the contract was that appellant's obligations concerning the development and distribution of water as defined in the contract were to continue until transferred to the mutual water companies. No such companies ever were organized.

The contract of October 2, 1912, provided for its continuance and termination as follows:

"If, within one year from the date hereof, the second party shall have sold 1,500 acres or over, or obtained agreements for the sale of same in accordance with the terms hereof, this agreement shall continue for two years from the date hereof; and if within two years from the date hereof the second party shall have sold or obtained agreements for the sale of 4,000 acres of said lands, in accordance with the terms hereof, then this agreement shall be extended and be in force for one year longer, during which third year the party of second part shall have the privilege of selling and disposing of all of the remainder of said lands upon the terms herein set forth. In the event sales are retarded or interfered with by failure of water developments, as herein agreed upon, then, if for that reason the sales made do not equal the acreage herein required, within the periods above specified, the time within which such acreage is to be sold shall be extended for a period equal to the time lost by reason of such failure of water developments."

It was also provided—

"That if it shall be ascertained and determined by the first party in the drilling of wells upon any portion of said lands that water cannot be discovered, produced, and developed for the irrigation of the same in adequate quantities, and at reasonable cost, then and in that event the first party shall in writing notify the party of the second part to that effect, and shall describe the lands upon which it has been ascertained and determined that it is not practicable to develop and deliver water in adequate quantities and at such reasonable cost, and such lands so described in such notice shall thereupon be removed from the terms of this agreement, and shall cease to be affected hereby or included herein."

[5] Without attempting to more minutely set forth the evidence tending to prove failure of appellant to perform the obligation which it had assumed with relation to the development and distribution of water in the early part of the year 1913, we state it as our conclusion that the evidence supports the finding that such failure did occur. That this condition, which continued to exist throughout the year 1913, was recognized by the officers of appellant, is indicated by a letter dated November 24, 1913, addressed to respondent, in the name of appellant, by its president and secretary, purporting to extend respondent's time for making sales. The letter said:

"This is to advise you that, in view of the fact that Lerdo land sales have been interfered with on account of water conditions and will necessarily be slow on that account in future, we hereby cancel your obligation to have sold 4,000 acres by October 2, 1914, and hereby extend the time in which you shall have sold that many acres to October 2, 1915, and you shall have until October 2, 1916, to sell out the entire Lerdo acreage."

During the year 1913, and while the unsatisfactory conditions above mentioned existed with respect to water supply for sundry purchasers of land in the Lerdo tract, respondent co-operated with appellant in the efforts which they made to prevent those purchasers from abandoning their contracts, by granting to them concessions with respect to their interest and water charges, and by extending their time for making payments.

On the 18th day of March, 1914, appellant served upon respondent a notice that it thereby withdrew and removed from the terms of the contract certain described land, which embraced all of subdivision A lying north and east of the railroad. This was done upon the stated ground that the withdrawal was made under the provisions of the contract and because of the fact "that it has been ascertained and determined by the said Lerdo Land Company in the drilling of wells upon said lands, and also in the attempt to discover, produce, and develop water for the irrigation of the same, that water cannot be discovered, produced, and developed for the irrigation of said lands in adequate quantities and at a reasonable cost." Respondent was thereby notified not to make any sales whatsoever of said withdrawn lands or any portion thereof. On the same day, March 18, 1914, appellant caused to be served upon respondent a notice that the Lerdo Land Company had refused to approve the abovementioned letter of November 24, 1913, and "you are further notified that no extension of time within which you may sell any of the land belonging to the Lerdo Land Company, under the provisions of the contract between it and you dated October 2, 1912, had been granted, and said letter is of no force or effect, and is not the act of, and is not approved by, said Lerdo Land Company."

In finding XXIV, after setting out the notice of withdrawal of lands dated March 18, 1914, the court found that in fact it was practicable to develop and deliver water in adequate quantities and at reasonable cost upon all of the lands described in said notice, and it had not been ascertained, in the drilling of wells upon any portion of said lands described in said notice, that water could not have been and could not be discovered, produced, and developed for the irrigation of said land in adequate quantities and at reasonable cost; "that at the date of said notice water had already developed in that portion of subdivision A lying north and east of the right of way of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company at a reasonable cost, and in such quantities as to demonstrate that an adequate supply could have been secured if defendant had diligently prosecuted its development work, and the work of distributing the water already developed, to the land sold and that remaining unsold in said subdivisin A of said Lerdo tract." After further statement of the acts of appellant in carrying out the policy indicated by these notices, the findings (No. XXV) declare that by its conduct in refusing to develop and distribute water upon said tract of land as required by said sales contract, and by the circulation of the information that plaintiff's selling campaign had been terminated under his contract, and by the repudiation of said extension agreement, and by its refusal to execute any contracts to purchasers of land in the Lerdo tract, produced by plaintiff, after March 18, 1914, appellant rendered it impossible for respondent to complete the sale of the land described in his contract and remaining unsold at the commencement of this action and "by such conduct prevented plaintiff from fully performing the terms of the said sales contract by selling all of the unsold land therein described," less a certain 1,390.08 acres which had been withdrawn from sale by mutual consent.

The court made the further finding (XXVI):

"If the selling of said Lerdo tract of land had not been interfered with by the defendant, and complete performance of plaintiff's sales contract had not been prevented, as hereinbefore found, and if said defendant had performed the terms and conditions of its said contract with plaintiff (Exhibit 1) for the development and distribution of water, the plaintiff would have been able to and would have sold the remainder of said tract of land, upon the terms and conditions mentioned in said sales contract, within the time prescribed in said contract and the extension thereof dated November 24, 1913, and by such performance he would have earned in excess of all expenses in making said sales the sum of $107,928.93, including the town site, and excluding the 1,390.8 acres withdrawn by mutual consent, and described in Exhibit 3 attached to the complaint. That plaintiff was thereby damaged by the defendant in the sum of $107,928.93, no part of which has been paid. And the court finds that 15 per cent. of the gross selling price of said land would have been the reasonable cost and expense to plaintiff of selling said unsold land."

The right of appellant to withdraw from the terms of the contract any land of the Lerdo tract, as such right was defined in the contract, was limited to one condition alone, which was that appellant must have ascertained and determined in the drilling of wells that water could not be discovered, produced, and developed on said land for their irrigation in adequate quantities and at reasonable cost. It was not provided that excessive cost of distribution of water produced and developed on any such land would alone authorize appellant to remove that land from the terms of the agreement. The purpose of the parties in making this reservation in the manner stated is plain when its subject-matter is considered. Whether wells thereafter to be driven would produce adequate quantities of water, or any water at all, or whether the cost of drilling wells would be excessive, was necessarily uncertain. On the other hand, the cost of labor and materials required for the construction of a distributing system was capable of ascertainment to a reasonable extent, and presumably was taken into consideration by appellant before deciding to go ahead with the enterprise and before entering into any contract with respondent. The evidence is sufficient to sustain the findings of fact stated in finding XXIV as hereinabove set forth. We are satisfied that by the conduct of appellant in endeavoring to withdraw the described land from the operation of the contract, and by its further conduct in refusing to proceed further under the contract, appellant was guilty of acts constituting breaches of its contract with respondent. The legal consequences of these acts will be discussed when we come to a review of the award of general damages and the exceptions thereto.

First Two Groups of Special Damages Claimed.—The first item of special damages allowed ($27,040.59) represents the unpaid commissions claimed to be due to respondent on certain sales made of parcels of land in the Lerdo tract, concerning which the court found:

"That solely because of the failure of defendant to perform its said contract with plaintiff and with each of the said purchasers, the contracts with the persons hereinafter named were canceled by the mutual consent of defendant and said purchasers, prior to the commencement of this action, but without the consent of plaintiff, and each of said purchasers was released by defendant from all further obligations of his said contract with defendant of every kind and description whatsoever."

The second item ($8,251.01) is identical with the first, except that the cancellations occurred after the commencement of this action.

[6-8] It is the general rule that, unless there is a provision in the contract to the contrary, a real estate agent employed to negotiate a sale of land earns his commission, and it is payable when he produces within the time allowed a purchaser who is ready, willing, and able to take the property on the terms prescribed or with whom the owner enters into a contract upon these or other terms satisfactory to him; and the agent cannot be deprived of the agreed compensation because deferred payments are not made by the purchaser, or because other terms of the contract are not carried out. Stewart v. Bowie, 185 Pac. 868. But the parties to an agency contract may make the payment of commission dependent upon any lawful condition. The contract may be so worded as to make it clear that the parties intended that the commissions, or some part thereof, were not to be paid except upon a completed sale, or (as in the case at bar) out of installments of the purchase money as the same shall be paid by the buyer. Shepherd-Teague Co. v. Hermann, 12 Cal. App. 394, 107 Pac. 622. It therefore follows that, to establish the liability of appellant for the payment of commissions to respondent (other than those paid at the time of making the initial payment) for any sale made by respondent, he must establish that the purchaser made some payment on the deferred purchase price, or that the purchaser did not make payment because of some fault of appellant. In other words, the right of respondent to recover the special damages claimed for nonpayment of commissions on the sales actually made cannot be sustained if the evidence is insufficient to prove that such nonpayment of installments by the purchaser resulted from the fault of appellant as set forth in the finding last above quoted. When the vendor does not comply with the terms of his contract, and as a result thereof the purchaser fails to complete his payments, the agent is, nevertheless, entitled to commissions which were to be paid out of the deferred purchase money of the land so bought. Realty Bonds, etc., Co. v. Point

Richmond, etc., Co., 171 Cal. 238, 152 Pac. 433. In Ratzlaff v. Trainor-Desmond Co., 41 Cal. App. 586, 183 Pac. 269 (Third District Court of Appeal), it was held that, if the contract of sale is canceled by mutual consent of the vendor and vendee, the vendor does thereby, in a legal sense, prevent the payment of the purchase price. It was pointed out that the commission contract necessarily implied that the vendor would act in good faith and do nothing to prevent, or even discourage or embarrass, the completed purchase of the property. It was the duty of the landowner, under his contract with the agent, to do everything possible to promote the fulfillment of the sales contract by the purchaser, "and thereby to aid in securing the purchase price, to the end that respondent might receive compensation for the services which he had performed."

Counsel for appellant contend that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding of the court that each of these purchasers would have complied with his contract if the conditions thereof with reference to the development and distribution of water had been performed; that, on the contrary, the evidence establishes without conflict that they forfeited their respective contracts without right, and not by reason of any fault of appellant. Pursuant to this contention, they insist that, according to the testimony of some of these purchasers, the reason they forfeited their respective contracts was that they were charged $8 per year for water, whereas, under the representations made to them, they should not have paid more than $4. Their contracts contained no agreement limiting the water rate, and there is no evidence that the charge made was excessive. Following the tabulation set out in the brief for appellant, we have examined this testimony.

The statements of some of these purchasers, but not of all, were clearly to the effect that on account of the high water rate alone they would have refused to make their payments, even if the water supply had been sufficient. By "sufficient" we think that it may fairly be inferred that they intend to refer to the agreed quantity, which was at the rate of 50 inches for each 160 acres of land. But under the contracts they were not entitled to refuse payment for that cause. The court, however, was not compelled to accept such testimony of purchasers as conclusive. Other evidence produced by respondent tends to show that, apart from the rates charged for water, the failure of appellant to produce and distribute the agreed supply of water for the use of these purchasers had caused them to be dissatisfied, and was sufficient to justify them in refusing to hold to their contracts, and, except for the concessions which they obtained as next hereinafter stated, probably would have caused them to refuse payment even if the water rate had not exceeded the expectations which they had derived from the representations made to them.

In the summer of 1913, after the failure to distribute water as provided by the contracts had occurred, and while the complaints on that score were under consideration by the parties, extension agreements were made whereby all of those purchasers except Irene Darnall and Mrs. M. C. Fritcher, remained in possession of their lands without charge for water, taxes, or interest until the end of the year. It was after these extensions had expired, and after notice and demand, and after failure by those parties to make further payments on the contracts, that their contracts were declared forfeited. Appellant contends, and the evidence appears to support that contention, that none of these cancellations, except under the Darnall and Fritcher contracts were made by mutual consent of the parties. After the contracts had been declared forfeited for nonperformance, then as to certain matters and as to certain claimed rights of possession, the defendant and some of the contract holders entered into special negotiations which resulted in the adjustment of those matters whereby, as a condition of such settlement, the purchasers surrendered their contracts. These being the facts, appellant contends that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding that these contracts were canceled by mutual consent of the parties because of the failure of the defendant to perform its obligations under those contracts. This contention is correct to the extent that by accepting the concessions thus granted the purchasers waived their right to abandon the contracts by reason of the then existing default of appellant in furnishing the water supply, but this waiver was conditioned upon the absence of any further failure of appellant to perform its contract obligations. It is not true, however, as to all of the purchasers, that the water supply continued to be insufficient. For example, J. S. Bird testified that in 1914 he had plenty of water, but for some reason, not defined, his crop was not satisfactory. There were others who testified that after 1913 they had "plenty of water." With respect to these parties, their waiver of their right to abandon the contracts remained in force, and the subsequent declaration of forfeiture of their contracts was an exercise by appellant of its rights in the premises. None of them thereafter asserted any claim for damages, or right of cancellation. It follows that the findings (XVI and XVII) now under consideration are not sustained as to all of those contracts. They are also excessive in allowing commissions for the sales to Mr. Weyand and to Mrs. Mitchell. Both of those purchasers gave testimony which, apparently without contradiction, proves that their failure to make their payments was based upon reasons which were outside of their contract rights against appellant. Mrs. Kelsey testified that she purchased the land through respondent, who promised to lease it for her. When she found that she could not lease the land, she did not choose to invest any further money in it. This appears to be the only reason why she did not go on with the contract.

[9] Appellant calls attention to a special list of commissions allowed, amounting to $13,507.30 (being a part of the above-mentioned sums of $27,040.59 and $8,251.01), concerning which counsel for appellant say that there is no testimony from the purchasers, or any other person, giving any reason why they failed to make their deferred payments. Respondent has not contradicted this statement. The index of the transcript shows only three persons, out of the 23 contracts covered by this list, who were witnesses at the trial. These were Cloud, Meudell, and J. P. Seaton. Seaton is the only one whose testimony indicates that his failure to pay resulted from failure to get sufficient water to irrigate his land. In all these instances, where there is no evidence tending to prove the reason for failure of the purchaser to make his deferred payments, the court was not justified by the evidence in finding that the contracts were canceled by mutual consent of appellant and the purchasers, or because of appellant's failure to perform its contract, Each one of the canceled contracts, about 58 in number, constitutes a separate item in the claim for commissions earned, and must be supported by evidence sufficient to entitle plaintiff to compensation under the rules hereinabove stated. When so examined, many items of the awards of $27,040.59 and $8,251.01 are not sustained by the evidence.

Third Group of Special Damage Claims.—Finding VIII reads as follows:

"Plaintiff sold to J. C. Apple, Alfred Curtis, W. E. James, and W. R. Godfrey 70 acres of said land at the contract price of $150 per acre, and the defendant executed to each of said purchasers a contract for the land for which he had made a written application, but each of said purchasers refused to accept the formal written contracts executed by defendant, and tendered to said purchasers for execution, solely because of defendant's failure and refusal to develop and distribute water necessary for the irrigation of said Lerdo tract and of said land so purchased, as it was required to do by the terms of its said contract with plaintiff. And if defendant had performed its said contract for the development and distribution of said water so that said land and other land in the Lerdo tract could have been irrigated, the said last-named purchasers would have executed said contracts tendered to them, and they were and each of them was ready, able, and willing to have paid for said land in accordance with the terms of said contracts so tendered to them, if the water had been developed and distributed by defendant as required by the terms of said contract with plaintiff. That commissions earned by plaintiff by the sale of the last-named 70 acres of land amounted to the sum of $3,500.00 no part of which sum has been paid to him or to any one for him."

It is conceded to be the law that in constructing such a contract as that of October 2, 1912, in order for an agent to earn his commission where the sale was not consummated, it is necessary to prove that he found a purchaser ready, willing, and able to buy the property on the terms fixed and either that he procured from that person a valid contract binding him to purchase the property upon those terms, or that he brought the vendor and the proposed purchaser together so that the vendor might have secured such contract if he desired.

Appellant contends that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding, especially in this, that the evidence is insufficient to prove that said four persons, or either of them, was ready, willing, and able to buy the property proposed to be sold to them. In 1913 Curtis visited the Lerdo tract with one of respondent's agents and made a deposit on two 10-acre lots. A few days later he visited the land again and observed that there were no ditches near completion near those lots. Being asked what caused him to refuse to go on with the purchase of that land, he said:

"Well, I could not see where to make myself —that they were going to get the water there; and, another thing, I could not see, to my estimate, that their price was to hold, anything to guarantee that the price was to hold the same price for water; that they could raise the price of the water any time they saw fit, that was my idea. * * * At the time I made the deposit on 23 and 24 I was ready, able, and willing to complete the purchase."

Apple visited the Lerdo tract and made a deposit of $100 on account of two lots. Subsequently he visited the land again. Seeing "that other people out there had not got their water, and so on and so forth," he declined to complete his first payment or to accept a contract.

"The fellow that sold me the land, he told me I was to get water from the well right adjoining the 20 acres, and then afterwards I heard that I was to get water from the other two wells a mile and a half below there, something like that. * * * I told him that I would get the water right there adjoining the land I had picked out, and I come to find out that I had to get it from way down below, and I seen the other crops out there wasn't doing well, and everybody else wasn't getting water, and I decided to let mine go."

James did not testify. According to a letter of January 20, 1914, from appellant's secretary to respondent, and respondent's reply thereto, it appears that some kind of preliminary agreement to purchase had been made with James in March, 1913. Miller's letter states that he instructed his agent at Bakersfield to have the James contract—

"returned immediately to this office or to have the same executed and the first payment made. * * * Our agent at Bakersfield advises that Mr. James has been away from Bakersfield, has never occupied the land, and did not receive any rent from same."

Godfrey did not testify. The only evidence concerning him was that of respondent's witness Stancliff, who stated:

"I showed some land in the Lerdo subdivision to a man by the name of Godfrey, W. R. Godfrey. I don't think he became a purchaser of any of the land of the Lerdo subdivision. The reason why he didn't become a purchaser was that he didn't like the contract. There was a discussion as to the water. The lack of proper distribution of the water wasn't the reason so much as the price of it—the price and interest and everything would eat it up. He was just a wage worker. He didn't have any capital, and that's the reason he didn't buy."

[10] It is not claimed that there was any evidence concerning these four sales different from that to which we have referred. Full commissions, amounting in all to $3,500, were allowed for these so-called sales. As to each of them, the evidence is insufficient to sustain the finding that he refused to execute the proposed contract with him "solely because of defendant's failure and refusal to develop and distribute water necessary for the irrigation of * * * said land so purchased." Curtis would not take the contract without a guaranteed limit on the price of water. The evidence does not show why James did not sign the contract, and it affirmatively shows that Godfrey was neither willing nor able to buy. The only one of these four purported sales on which the evidence creates a shadow of right of the plaintiff to commissions is that relating to the sale to J. C. Apple.

[11] Fourth Group of Special Damage Claims.—On these claims commissioners were allowed in the total sum of $14,687.50, being for sales to Burke, Killian, Paul, and Reiss. The court found that between April 10, 1914, and August 1, 1914, respondent procured bona fide offers from the persons named for the purchase of certain lots in the Lerdo tract; that each of said persons was ready, able, and willing to buy said land and to execute a written contract for the purchase of the land selected, and was ready, willing, and able to pay for the land at certain prices and on certain terms, which were in conformity with the agreement between appellant and respondent concerning such contracts; that plaintiff requested the defendant to execute a contract to each of said persons for said lands, and the defendant failed and refused to execute and deliver any contract to either of them; that, if said contracts had been executed and delivered by defendant when requested or within any reasonable time, the said persons would have executed said contracts and would have paid the purchase price in accordance with the terms and conditions thereof.

In harmony with the disposition hereinbefore made of the questions relating to the interpretation of the contract of October 2, 1912, and the obligations of appellant thereunder, we hold that respondent was entitled to make these alleged sales. At this point it is only necessary to consider the contention of appellant which attacks the good faith of these alleged sales. Respondent testified that on April 10, 1914, he made the sale of certain described lots to James A. Burke, and sent to appellant a written application requesting that contract for that land be executed to Mr. Burke. The application described the lots, the price, the installment amounts, showed that no deposit had been made, and was unsigned. Similar transactions occurred respecting the sales to Killian, Paul, and Alma C. Reiss. None of these contracts ever was executed by appellant.

Killian, Burke, and Paul testified that they were ready, able, and willing to make their first payments, and would have done so if the contracts had been executed. S. N. Reiss, husband of Alma C. Reiss, conducted the negotiations for the Reiss contract, but directed that it be made in her name. He testified that he was making the purchase for his wife, and that he was ready, able, and willing to purchase the land and pay for it according to the terms indicated by the receipt. At about the end of July, 1914, which was after appellant had refused to execute contracts for these sales, these parties, at the request of respondent, signed the agent's receipt. In making this request by letter to Burke, respondent in that letter said:

"I wish you would sign the inclosed agent's receipt and return to me at the place provided for purchaser to sign, as an evidence that you were willing prior to April 20, 1914, to enter into an agreement to buy this land. By signing this agreement, you do not obligate yourself to purchase the land at all now, unless you see fit, as the agreement specifically provides that the Lerdo Land Company should have entered into an agreement with you ten days subsequent to April 10, 1914, which they refused to do."

While the act of respondent in asking for a signature to such a document three or four months after its date, and the fact that these receipts were made up and sent to appellant with a request that appellant execute contracts when in fact the proposed purchaser had not made the usual deposit and had not signed any preliminary memorandum of sale, were circumstances to be considered by the court in determining whether or not the offers were made in good faith, they were not conclusive as against the other evidence tending to support the finding as made by the court.

General Damages.—Besides the special damages awarded, we have seen that respondent was allowed damages in a sum specified as the net amount of compensation which he would have earned upon sale of all that part of the Lerdo tract which remained unsold at the time when performance of the contract by respondent was prevented by appellant. Appellant contends that such damages are speculative and uncertain in their nature and are incapable of proof; that, in fact, the evidence offered to prove that the plaintiff would have been able to sell and would have sold all of the lands of the Lerdo tract upon the prescribed terms and within the time agreed upon between appellant and respondent, if such performance by respondent had not been prevented by appellant, is insufficient to establish those facts; and that the court erred in overruling appellant's objections to the evidence.

[12] For the purpose of showing that he could have sold all of the land in question, respondent introduced testimony showing that large amounts of land had been sold in other subdivisions made in other localities of the San Joaquin Valley, and tending to prove that the Lerdo land was more desirable for selling purposes than were these other tracts. Basing their statements upon acquaintance with the real estate market in the vicinity where some of these other lands had been sold, witnesses testified favorably to respondent's contention that he could have sold the land; such testimony being, in part, as follows: The witness Baldeschwieler testified, "We could have sold a good deal of that land," giving as the reason for this opinion that "there was a good deal of land sold up in that part of the country." Alexander, another subagent who had made some sales there, said that the failure of crops there in 1913, "caused by no water," had prevented him from selling about 80 acres to persons who stated that they would not buy "because there wasn't sufficient water"; also that, if there had been no water failure, he "might have probably sold 1,000 acres, or probably better." Respondent testified that the entire 745 lots in the town site of the town of Lerdo could have been sold at $150 per lot, which he said was their average value. We have taken these facts from the review of the evidence as contained in the brief for appellant. The evidence thus brought to view shows that the tract was favorable situated for selling purposes; that the land was shown to various prospective purchasers who did not buy; that some of these witnesses gave it as their opinion that they would have been able to sell some of the Lerdo land. There was also evidence indicating a serious decline in the condition of the real estate market from the year 1913 until and including the year 1915. Counsel for respondent, on the other hand, contend that the evidence is sufficient to support the finding in question, since the following additional probative facts exist: Between December 1, 1912, and May 1, 1913, respondent sold to bona fide purchasers Lerdo lands aggregating 1,198.91 acres, for which contracts were executed; that other sales were negotiated, but failed of completion because of the failure of appellant to install an irrigation system such as the contract required; that respondent made additional sales to bona fide purchasers between May 1, 1913, and March 17, 1914; that he had made sales amounting to a grand total of 1,881.71 acres before his sales contract was repudiated by appellant; that "this concrete fact of actual accomplishment, under the most unfavorable conditions, is the most potent evidence of the very reasonable probability that all the balance of the land could have been sold within the extended period agreed upon in the letter of November 24, 1913, if appellant had complied with its contract and its promises instead of repudiating its obligations as it did do in March, 1914."

Section 3300 of the Civil Code states the rule of damages for breach of contract as follows:

> "For the breach of an obligation arising from contract, the measure of damages, except where otherwise expressly provided by this Code, is the amount which will compensate the party aggrieved for all the detriment proximately caused thereby, or which, in the ordinary course of things, would be likely to result therefrom."

In connection with appellant's contention that the evidence is insufficient to support the finding that all of the land would have been sold, counsel for appellant depend upon the rule (which has been applied under defined conditions which appellant claims are illustrative of the conditions proved here) that prospective profits are too speculative and remote to justify an award of damages; in other words, that their nature is such that it is incapable of being proved that in the ordinary course of things such damages would be likely to result from the breach of the contract. The contention is not that lost profits may not be included as a proper element of damages. But, admitting that such profits are a proper subject of recovery if capable of being ascertained, the contention is that, as applied to a contract like that here under consideration, the claimed profits are too speculative and remote to be capable of anything like reasonable ascertainment.

[13] The subject of damages by reason of loss of prospective profits, and evidence admissible to prove such loses, was considered and discussed by the Supreme Court of California in Pac. Steam Whaling Co. v. Alaska Packers' Ass'n, 138 Cal. 632, 72 Pac. 161. During the fishing season of 1897 the defendant unlawfully and forcibly excluded plaintiff from fishing in the ocean along certain portions of the shore of Alaska. Overruling objections of the defendant, plaintiff was permitted to introduce evidence tending to show how many fish the plaintiff could, with reasonable probability, have taken from the fishing grounds in question if it had not been excluded therefrom by the unlawful acts of defendant, the value of such fish, and the profits which would reasonably have accrued to plaintiff from the fish when canned. Plaintiff was also, in this connection, allowed to introduce evidence tending to show how many fish defendant actually did take in those fisheries during said season. The court instructed the jury that, if it found that plaintiff suffered damage by reason of the alleged wrongful acts of the defendant, then, in assessing the amount of damages caused to plaintiff by the alleged wrongful acts, the jury might consider the loss, if any, to the plaintiff of probable profits in its business. Defendant claimed that the evidence pointed to damages too much in the nature of mere speculative profits to be admissible at all. In response to this contention the Supreme Court said:

"We do not think that in these rulings of the court as to evidence, or in giving the said instructions, there was any error. The profits sought to be proved were not so remote, uncertain, prospective, or conjectural as to be entirely beyond the range of legitimate damages. * * * With respect to this kind of damage, of course, there cannot be the absolute certainty possible in many plainer cases; but a wrongdoer cannot entirely escape the consequences of his unlawful acts merely on account of the difficulty of proving damages; he can do so only where there is no possibility of a reasonably proximate estimation of such damages, which is not the fact in the case at bar. The waters in question here constituted a special salmon fishery, where those fishes were to be found in great abundance, and the proposition that damages evidently suffered by plaintiff from the wrongful act of the defendant by which plaintiff was excluded from exercising the clearly valuable right of fishing in those waters are entirely beyond legal proof cannot be maintained. We think that on this point the case at bar is within the rule announced in Shoemaker v. Acker, 116 Cal. 239, and cases there cited."

Shoemaker v. Acker, supra, 116 Cal. 239, 48 Pac. 62, was an action to recover damages for breach of contract. The contract provided that defendant would purchase land and furnish capital for its improvement; that plaintiff should have charge of the improvement and cultivation of the land, and have an interest in the income and profits derived from the sale of the land or its products, and in the increase of value of the land. Plaintiff agreed to devote his whole time and attention to the management and improvement of the property and the sale of the land and the products thereof. After land had been purchased, and after plaintiff had devoted more than a year to its care and improvement, the defendant attempted to annul the contract, by acts which were held to constitute a breach thereof. Referring to the rule of damages stated in section 3300, Civil Code, and the subject of future profits, the court pointed out that the cases in which future profits had been rejected as speculative or too remote were cases where the asserted future profits were entirely collateral to the subject-matter of the contract, and not consequences flowing in a direct line from the breach of such contract. It was there held, and authorities were cited to that effect, that profits or advantages which are the direct and immediate fruits of the contract may be recovered, and that the damages claimed in the case at bar were of the kind which are recoverable under the principles stated.

In Western Union Tel. Co. v. Commercial Pac. Cable Co., 177 Cal. 577, 171 Pac. 317, the action was one for an injunction to prevent the imposing of a discriminatory regulation and the exaction of a discriminatory toll, and to recover damages for injuries sustained by the demand and exaction. In determining the question of damages for injuries sustained by the demand and exaction, the plaintiff was permitted to introduce evidence showing the injury which plaintiff would sustain through falling off of any business, with consequent loss of profits, as a direct result of such discrimination. This was held to be a proper subject for the admeasurement of damages where the evidence disclosed a reasonable probability of their approximate estimation. The court said:

"It admits with no dispute that the plaintiff would have some falling off in business with its consequent loss of profits as a direct result of the discrimination of which it complains. The injury which it would thus suffer through the loss of such probable profits has heretofore been held by this court to be the proper subject of admeasurement of damages in cases where the evidence disclosed a reasonable possibility of their approximate estimation"—citing Shoemaker v. Acker, supra; Pacific Steam Whaling Co. v. Alaska Packer's Ass'n, supra; and McQuilkin v. Postal Tel. Cable Co., 27 Cal. App. 698, 151 Pac. 21.

In Schumann v. Karrer, 192 Pac. 849, the defendant had leased to the plaintiff a butcher shop and slaughterhouse for the term of two years, and entered into an agreement that during the term of the lease he would not carry on the butcher business in the described vicinity. The action was for an injunction and for damages for plaintiff's breach of this stipulation. The court permitted the plaintiff to give testimony tending to show the value of his business and the loss which would probably ensue from appellant's interference and rivalry; also the loss which he had sustained by reason of not being able to purchase and fatten hogs and dispose of them, because of appellant's interference with said business. The rule stated in Shoemaker v. Acker, supra, was repeated and approved, and applied; it being noted, however, that the damage here in question was in the form of loss of profits to an established business of a permanent character.

In McConnell v. Corona City Water Co., 149 Cal. 60, 85 Pac. 929, 8 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1171, the award to plaintiff of damages consisting of profits which he would have made on a contract for the construction of a tunnel was sustained. Referring to the numerous cases wherein damages for loss of prospective profits have been denied upon the ground that they were too speculative and remote, the court said:

"Such is the undoubted rule, but it is to be noted that this is not an objection to the inclusion of profits as a proper element of damages, but is a declaration merely that when they are too speculative and remote to be capable of anything like reasonable ascertainment, when they are collateral merely and do not arise directly or by natural consequence out of the tort complained of, they cease to become a proper element in the admeasurement of damages. No one may contest the soundness of this principle, but the converse of it is equally true, that where prospective profits are not too speculative and remote, where they do arise directly and as a natural consequence out of the injury, they are always allowed as an element of damage."

In the case at bar the contract gave to respondent the exclusive right to sell the described land. Respondent on his part agreed to conduct a campaign for and the business of selling the land to the end that the same should be sold in the shortest possible time, and agreed not to engage in the sale of other land subdivisions during the life of the agreement. The distinction between such a contract and a nonexclusive contract of agency was pointed out in Friedman v. McKay Leather Co., 179 Cal. 566, 178 Pac. 139. It was held that in seeking compensation for breach by the principal of a contract wherein the agency was not exclusive and the agent did not contract to devote his time to the selling of the principal's goods, and where the compensation of the agent was to be a commission on sales made by him, damages on the basis of the suppositive sales are not recoverable unless it is shown that the sales would in fact have been made by the agent. The court referred to Parke v. Frank, 75 Cal. 364, 17 Pac. 427, where the court, in determining the measure of damages in case of a breach of an agency contract, said:

"The plaintiffs very properly made no effort to establish the profits they might have made, during any definite period, had defendant complied with his contract. From the nature of the case such damages must have been purely speculative."

There is no doubt that the rule thus stated in Parke v. Frank was properly applied in that case since the agency there was not exclusive. Also plaintiff had not agreed to represent the defendant alone, but in fact held other agencies for manufacturers operating in compensation with the defendant.

[14, 15] The evidence to which we have referred, upon which finding XXVI must rest, falls into three classes: (a) Evidence of sales in other subdivisions; (b) opinions of witnesses that sales could have been made; (c) the quantities of land actually sold by respondent. All of this evidence was admitted over objections urged thereto by appellant. The rulings overruling those objections are duly specified as errors on account of which it is claimed that the judgment should be reversed. The evidence of sales made of land in other places in the San Joaquin Valley at the period of time in question should have been rejected. In itself, it was irrelevant to the issue to be determined, which was whether or not the plaintiff could have sold the Lerdo lands. Conditions with respect to water supply, and other conditions, were different in various particulars in those several tracts from the conditions existing in the Lerdo tract, or which would have existed in the Lerdo tract even if appellant had complied with all of its obligations relating to the development and distribution of water thereon. The evidence of what one set of agents accomplished in the sale of a given subdivision of land is too remote and uncertain in its bearing to be receivable as evidence that another agent could have sold the lands of another subdivision. This evidence could have had no possible relation to the question at issue unless it had been used by witnesses as a basis and reason for their opinion that this particular land could have been sold. Even then it would not be admissible unless such opinion evidence was admissible, nor unless brought in by cross-examination after the opinion had been stated. But the opinions of the witnesses themselves were improperly admitted. We think that the correct rule is stated in the note found in L. R. A. 1916B, at page 875:

"And opinion evidence as to the value of an exclusive agency contract and the profits which might have been made or the amount of business which might have been done under the agency if it had not been wrongfully terminated is not admissible, since such opinion would be purely speculative and conjectural."

In support of the rule thus stated, the note refers to Wakeman v. Wheeler & Wilson Mfg. Co., 101 N. Y. 205, 4 N. E. 264, 54 Am. Rep. 676. In that case the right of the plaintiffs to recover prospective profits lost by them by reason of the conduct of the defendant in preventing them from carrying out the contract was sustained. It was further held that the plaintiffs were entitled to prove the things which they had accomplished under the contract, and the circumstances existing at the time of the breach whereby it appeared that they had suffered damages in some amount and whereby, from the extent of the business done, an estimate could have been made of the value of the contract to the plaintiffs. But on the question of opinion evidence the court said:

"We think the opinions of witnesses as to the value of the agreement, as to the profits which it or any agency established in pursuance of it could produce, as to the damages plaintiffs realized, and as to the number of machines they could have sold were properly excluded. This was not a case for expert or opinion evidence. There was no certain basis of facts proved or facts assumed upon which an opinion could be based. The conflicting opinions of interested witnesses, selected because of their favorable opinions, instead of aiding the jury, would probably add to their embarrassment. The safer rule in all such cases is to exclude opinions and receive the facts, and then leave the matter for the determination of the jury. They may not have any certain basis upon which to rest their judgment, but that cannot be helped. They are supposed to be disinterested and must apply their experience and common sense to the facts proved and reach the best results they can."

The evidence showing the quantities of land sold by respondent and the rate at which sales were progressing when further performance of the contract by respondent was prevented by appellant was properly received, and the court did not err in overruling the objections thereto. It was evidence, however meager, tending to prove that further sales could have been made except for the acts of interference by appellant. If the court had received that evidence alone, and had accepted it as proof of the fact that respondent could have sold all of the land within the time limited by the contract, it may be that on appeal the findings would have to be sustained as sufficiently supported by the evidence. But it is doubtful whether upon that evidence alone—and we cannot satisfactorily hold that upon that evidence alone—the court would have found it to be true that respondent would have been able to sell all of the unsold lands in the tract. The court having overruled objections to the other evidence to which we have referred, we must assume that weight was given to that evidence in determining the fact. There was evidence tending to prove that the real estate market was less active in the year 1914 than in the year 1913, and had diminished to a state of extreme dullness in 1916. It therefore is not at all clear that the finding in question would have been made if the evidence of sales of lands in other parts of the San Joaquin Valley and the opinion evidence of witnesses had been excluded. The erroneous rulings therefore must be considered so far prejudicial to the rights of appellant that they cannot be disregarded.

The judgment is reversed.

We concur: SHAW, J.; JAMES, J.

Opinion of Supreme Court in Bank Denying Hearing.

PER CURIAM. In the opinion of the District Court of Appeal herein it is said that, under the contract of October 2, 1912, no right was given to the Lerdo Land Company to withdraw any land from the terms of said contract upon its determination that water could not be conducted from the wells to the land, or any part thereof, in adequate quantities and at reasonable cost. The court says:

"It was not provided that excessive cost of distribution of water produced and developed on any such land would alone authorize appellant to remove that land from the terms of the agreement."

The provision of the contract on that subject refers to the reasonable cost of delivering the water, as well as the cost of producing or developing it, and it is a matter of grave doubt whether the agreement does not authorize a withdrawal of the land from the agreement by the company, upon ascertaining and determining that the delivery of the water by ordinary ditches could not be made in adequate quantities at reasonable cost. While we deny a rehearing on the petition of the respondent, we think it proper to qualify the opinion in his favor so far as to say that the opinion of the District Court on the above question should not be considered as a part of the law of the case upon the new trial to be had therein, but should be left open for consideration, upon such evidence of extrinsic circumstances, if any, as may be properly admitted to explain its meaning, and upon such further consideration as the court below may give to the question of the proper construction of the contract on its face alone upon this point.

The petition for rehearing is denied.

All concur, except WILBUR, J., absent.

53 Cal. App. 317

CORNELL v. WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH CO. (Civ. 2315.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 25, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 22, 1921.)

1. Telegraphs and telephones ⟸70(1)—Loss of profits on pasturing cattle held not recoverable as damages.

In an action for damages for delay in delivering a telegram, the measure of damages is not that established by Civ. Code, § 3308, for the breach of a seller's agreement to deliver personal property, though by the delay plaintiff was prevented from buying cattle, but is the amount which will compensate plaintiff for the detriment approximately caused thereby, under section 3300 or 3333, depending on whether the action is for breach of contract or for tort; and therefore plaintiff cannot recover the difference between the contract price of the cattle which he was prevented from buying and the price at which he could have resold them after pasturing them without proof he could not have purchased other cattle in the open market.

2. Telegraphs and telephones ⟸66(4)—Evidence held not to establish measure of damages for delay.

In an action for delay in delivering a telegram, whereby plaintiff was prevented from exercising an option to purchase cattle, evidence that at the time and place the cattle in question had a market value between $25 and $35 a head is too indefinite to support a finding as to damages, especially where the finding was greater than the damages, if the larger figure as to market value was taken.

3. Telegraphs and telephones ⟸53—Not liable for delay in delivering telegram offering loan to purchase cattle without proof cattle could not have been purchased after delivery.

A telegraph company is not liable for substantial damages for delay in the delivery of a telegram offering to loan plaintiff money with which to purchase cattle for pasturing, where the evidence showed that the cattle in question were not sold to another until long after the telegram was delivered, and did not show that plaintiff could not have purchased them upon receipt of the message.

Appeal from Superior Court, Tulare County; J. A. Allen, Judge.

Action by E. B. Cornell against the Western Union Telegraph Company to recover damages for delay in delivering a telegram. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Reversed.

C. L. Russell, Jr., and Russell & Heid, of Tulare, Lamberson & Lamberson, of Visalia, and Beverly L. Hodghead, of San Francisco, for appellant.

Middlecoff, Scott & Ham, of Visalia, for respondent.

BURNETT, J. The action was for damages caused by the failure of defendant to promptly deliver a telegram, and plaintiff had judgment for the sum of $534, from which the appeal is taken. The telegram was left at the office of L. N. Cornell, a brother of plaintiff, who was away at the time, and was not delivered to plaintiff until several days thereafter. The telegram was sent by one W. H. Coffinberry from South San Francisco, and related to a loan of $5,000 from the South San Francisco Cattle Loan Company, for which plaintiff had made application to enable him to purchase some cattle.

As to the damage suffered by plaintiff the court found:

"That on the 27th day of September, 1916, plaintiff held an option from D. H. McLemore to purchase from him 178 cattle, consisting of red heifers which were then located in the state of Oregon; that said McLemore had agreed with plaintiff to sell cattle to plaintiff within five days from said date for the price and sum of $5,000, and deliver said cattle to plaintiff at Porterville, Cal., freight paid; that said cattle were reasonably worth to plaintiff at said time the sum of $5,534; that plaintiff had abundant feed at said Porterville with which to feed said cattle; that said plaintiff would have made a profit on said cattle of $534; * * * that between the said 27th day of September and said 4th day of October, 1916 (the date when said telegram was delivered to plaintiff), said plaintiff's option and opportunity to purchase said cattle expired, and, by reason of the fact that defendant did not deliver said message to plaintiff, plaintiff did not know that said South San Francisco Cattle Loan Company had approved plaintiff's application for said loan, and plaintiff did not have the money otherwise to pay for said cattle, and thereby lost the option and opportunity to purchase said cattle, to plaintiff's damage in the sum of $534."

[1] The trial court apparently adopted an erroneous theory as to the detriment caused to plaintiff by the negligence of defendant. The court seems to have applied the rule found in section 3308 of the Civil Code, providing as follows:

"The detriment caused by the breach of a seller's agreement to deliver personal property, the price of which has not been fully paid in advance, is deemed to be the excess, if any, of the value of the property to the buyer, over the amount which would have been due to the seller under the contract, if it had been fulfilled."

Herein, however, there was no breach of the seller's agreement. Indeed, the action against defendant was based upon the theory that the seller was, at all times within the period of the option, ready and willing to carry out his agreement. Said section prescribes the measure of damages for a particular condition that is not found herein, but the rule applicable to the situation in this case is embodied in section 3300 or 3333 of said Code. If the action may be said to be founded on contract, the former will apply; if it be regarded as based upon a tort, then the latter. It is sufficient to quote section 3300, as follows:

"For the breach of an obligation arising from contract, the measure of damages, except where otherwise expressly provided by this Code, is the amount which will compensate the party aggrieved for all the detriment approximately caused thereby, or which, in the ordinary course of things, would be likely to result therefrom."

It is well also in this connection to bear in mind section 3301, as follows:

"No damages can be recovered for a breach of contract which are not clearly ascertainable in both their nature and origin."

Manifestly these sections prescribe a very general measure of damages, and it is not always easy to determine what particular facts satisfy the requirement of the rule.

In applying the measure to a case like this, however, the natural and reasonable inquiry is: What was the market value of similar cattle at Porterville, and whether they could have been obtained by respondent after said telegram was delivered. If he could have then bought the same or similar cattle at the same price as he had promised to pay, it can hardly be said that in contemplation of law he suffered more than nominal damages in consequence of the negligence of defendant. In 37 Cyc. p. 1765, the rule is stated as follows:

"If by reason of the negligence of a telegraph company in regard to the transmission or delivery of a message a purchase is defeated resulting in a loss to plaintiff, the company will be liable. The general rule is that the measure of damages is the difference between the contract price and the market value of the goods at the time and place of delivery; and where, as the result of the telegraph company's negligence, the purchase is not lost but delayed, there may as a general rule be a recovery for the rise in market value of the subject-matter of the sale during the delay."

In the note to Western Union Tel. Co. v. Cooper, as reported in 10 Am. St. Rep. 772, many cases are collated in support of this general statement of the rule:

"Actual damages sustained by reason of failures, delays, or errors of a telegraph company in transmitting or delivering messages intrusted to it may be recovered by the sender when such damages are the natural and proximate result of the company's default, and may be fairly considered to have been in the contemplation of the parties when the contract was made."

We may refer to some of the cases cited therein as illustrating the application of the rule.

In Western Union Tel. Co. v. Du Bois, 128 Ill. 248, 21 N. E. 4, 15 Am. St. Rep. 109, an Illinois case, M. sent through the telegraph company a message informing the plaintiff that he would sell him apples at $1.75 per barrel. The company delivered the message, stating $1.55 as the price per barrel. The plaintiff then ordered the apples, and had to pay the $1.75 to have them delivered to him. The difference was held to be the measure of his damages.

In Hadley v. Western Union Tel. Co., 115 Ind. 191, 15 N. E. 845, the plaintiff had sold cattle for future delivery at the option of the purchaser. The latter sent a dispatch informing him that he would take the cattle on the morning of the next day. It was the custom of stock dealers to take the weight of cattle at early daylight. Through the negligence of the telegraph company to promptly deliver the message the weighing of the cattle was delayed, whereby the weight decreased. It was held that the defendant was liable in damages for the loss of weight resulting from its negligence.

In Manville v. Western Union Tel. Co., 37 Iowa, 214, 18 Am. Rep. 8, plaintiff's correspondent sent him this message: "Ship your hogs at once." The delivery of the message was delayed four days by defendant's negligence. It was held by the court that—

"The difference between the market value of the hogs on the day plaintiff could have put them on the market if the defendant had been guilty of no negligence in the delivery of the dispatch, and the market price when plaintiff was afterward able to put his hogs into the market, * * * is the measure of damages which may fairly be supposed to have entered into the contemplation of the parties at the time the message was delivered to defendant's operator at Chicago."

In True v. International Tel. Co., 60 Me. 9, 11 Am. Rep. 156, the plaintiff, in replying to an offer of a cargo of corn, sent this message: "Ship cargo named at ninety, if you can secure freight at ten." The message was not delivered. The price of corn and freight advanced immediately after, and the plaintiff was obliged to buy at the advanced rate. The court held that—

"The sum * * * which would be compensation for the direct loss and injury sustained by the nondelivery of this message is the difference (if at a higher rate) between the 90 cents named and the sum which the plaintiffs were or would have been compelled to pay at the same place, in order, by due and reasonable diligence, after notice of the failure of the telegram, to purchase the like quantity and quality of the same species of merchandise."

In Leonard v. New York, etc., Tel. Co., 41 N. Y. 544, 1 Am. St. Rep. 446, the plaintiffs' agents at Chicago sent to the plaintiffs at Oswego this message: "Send five thousand sacks of salt immediately." The company delivered the message reading "casks" instead "sacks." The plaintiffs shipped the casks, but there being no market for that kind of salt in Chicago at the time, it sold for less there than it was selling for at Oswego. It was held that the measure of damages was the difference between the market value at Oswego and at Chicago, together with the transportation from Oswego to Chicago.

In United States Tel. Co. v. Wenger, 55 Pa. 262, 93 Am. Dec. 751, in relation to the purchase of stocks, the difference between the agreed price and the market value was held to be the measure of the damage.

In Washington, etc., Tel. Co. v. Hobson, 15 Grat. (Va.) 122, the message was in relation to the purchase of 500 bales of cotton. The message as delivered read 2,500 bales. The damage was held to be the loss sustained on the resale of the excess above that ordered.

We have found no authority holding that, in a case like this, a recovery may be had for speculative profits that might have been enjoyed in the future if it had not been for the negligence of the telegraph company. The cases cited by respondent, as far as they relate to this point, do not support his contention.

In Union Const. Co. v. Western Tel. Co., 163 Cal. 298, 125 Pac. 242, we find a painstaking and exhaustive consideration of various questions relating to the negligence of the telegraph company, including the contention of the defendant that the plaintiff had sustained no damage by reason of its failure to deliver a certain message in reference to a contract for the doing of certain work at a stated price. The Supreme Court properly held that the plaintiff was entitled to recover the difference between what it would have had to pay under said contract and what it was compelled to pay under the best contract it could secure.

In Parks v. Alta California Telegraph Co., 13 Cal. 423, 73 Am. Dec. 589, by reason of the negligence of the telegraph company in transmitting a message, plaintiff was prevented from levying an attachment to secure his claim until other creditors obtained the first attachment and exhausted the assets of the debtor. The actual damage was manifestly the amount of the plaintiff's claim, and the court held that he was entitled to recover this amount.

In Kerns & Larton v. Western Union Telegraph Co., 170 Mo. App. 642, 157 S. W. 106, by reason of defendant's delay in delivering a telegram a carload of peaches did not reach their destination in time for the morning market and plaintiff was compelled to sell them at a discount. It was properly held that the measure of damage was the difference between the selling price and what they could have been sold for if they had arrived in time.

Kerns & Larton v. Western Union Telegraph Co., 174 Mo. App. 435, 160 S. W. 556, had to do with delay in delivering a telegram for the purchase of potatoes, and the rule of damages was declared to be "the difference between the price that the sender * * * agreed to pay therefor and the sum which he would have been compelled to pay at the same place, in order, by due diligence, to have purchased * * * like quantity and quality of * * * merchandise."

In Levy Bros. v. Western Union Telegraph Co., 39 Okl. 416, 135 Pac. 423, a mistake was made in transmitting a message from the owner of real estate to certain real estate agents, whereby they were misled as to the payment of a commission, and after selling the property it was justly held that they were entitled to recover from the company the value of their services up to the time they discovered the mistake.

In Thompson v. Western Union Tel. Co., 64 Wis. 531, 25 N. W. 789, 54 Am. Rep. 644, plaintiff lost the sale of a horse by reason of delay in the transmission of a message, and it was held that he was entitled to recover his actual loss, the sum of $25.

The main question involved in the Cooper Case, supra, was whether "injury to feelings disconnected from all actual personal injury are exemplary damages," and it was held that they constituted an element of the actual damage and might properly be considered in determining the amount to be awarded, if the negligence of the telegraph company were the proximate cause of such injury.

It is due counsel to say that the foregoing cases are cited in support of the general scheme of plaintiff's complaint, and for that purpose they are not without value, but we have examined them to see if therein is anything inconsistent with indorsement of the measure of damages which we have declared as applicable to a case like this. Upon that point there seems to be no conflict, and we take it that the general rule as before indicated is well established.

If it can be said that, under peculiar circumstances, a plaintiff who has been prevented by the negligence of a telegraph company from purchasing stock may recover as damages the profit which he might reasonably expect to derive in the future by reason of increasing their value through his own efforts, manifestly there should be allegation and proof of such peculiar circumstances. Acheson v. Western Union Tel. Co., 96 Cal. 641, 31 Pac. 583. To contend with any plausibility that such theory is applicable here it would be necessary at least to show that plaintiff could not obtain said or similar cattle by the exercise of reasonable diligence. No negligence on the part of appellant would absolve respondent from the duty to exercise ordinary care to avoid injury.

No such showing was made, and there is no room for the contention that he was entitled to the peculiar profits that he might have derived from pasturing and taking care of said stock.

[2] The only substantial evidence of the market value of similar stock at Porterville at the time of the proposed purchase is found in the testimony of McLemore, as follows:

"Q. What was the actual market value of this band of cattle spoken of by you which you agreed to sell to Mr. Cornell for $5,000? A. They were not beef cattle. There was really no sale for them at that time.

"Q. Well, they had a value, a market value? A. Yes.

"Q. At Porterville, did they? A. Yes; I should judge they were worth between $25 and $30 a head just then."

Such testimony is too indefinite upon which to base a finding. But upon the basis of the larger figure the profit would be only $2 a head, or $340 instead of $534 as found by the court.

It is true that plaintiff testified as to the value of the cattle, but it is apparent from the record that he had in view not the market but the peculiar value to him in view of prospective profits from pasturing the cattle. In fact he had never seen the cattle, and it does not appear that he was familiar with their market value. The question that he answered, over objection, was:

"Now if those cattle had been delivered and if they were of the kind which McLemore represented them to you to be, what would have been their value at that time at Porterville after delivery to you?"

His answer was between $8,000 and $9,000. It is also apparent from the findings that the trial court based the conclusion as to the amount of damages upon the probable profits to be derived from pasturing the stock.

[3] Moreover, plaintiff did not show that he could not have purchased the stock from McLemore after the telegram was delivered. It is true that he and McLemore contemplated that the sale should take place within four or five days after their conversation at Fresno. This would be before the telegram was delivered, but there seems to have been no definite agreement as to the time within which the option should continue. Indeed, the most reasonable view is that the purchase could have been made after the message was received. He testified:

"Mr. McLemore said if the San Francisco Cattle Loan Company approved my application that he would ship me the heifers immediately, that he was holding them without feed, and he wanted to get rid of them."

It appears that the cattle were not sold by McLemore until some 60 days thereafter, and there is no evidence that he was not willing to sell to plaintiff at the same price after the latter had the chance to secure the money. At any rate, before he could hold defendant for his loss in not taking advantage of the opportunity to purchase the cattle he must show that the opportunity was not still open.

Some other questions are discussed, but they will probably not arise again, and for that reason we forego specific consideration of them.

For the reason stated, we think the judgment must be reversed; and it is so ordered.

We concur: FINCH, P. J.; HART, J.

53 Cal. App. 229

Ex parte VOLPI. (Cr. 567.)

(District Court of Appeal, Third District, California. June 17, 1921.)

1. Intoxicating liquors ⟸17—Penal ordinance of city not void as violative of Eighteenth Amendment.

A penal ordinance of the city of Stockton, denouncing the offense of selling intoxicating liquors containing more than one-half of 1 per cent. alcohol by volume, is not void as violative of Fed. Const. Amend. 18.

2. Intoxicating liquors ⟸132 — Volstead Act not intended to nullify penal ordinance of city.

The Volstead Act, enforcing on the part of Congress the Eighteenth Amendment to the federal Constitution, prohibiting the manufacture or the sale of intoxicants, was not intended to nullify a penal ordinance of the city of Stockton, denouncing the offense of selling intoxicating liquors containing more than one-half of 1 per cent. alcohol by volume.

3. Intoxicating liquors ⟸132 — Fact local statute or city ordinance is more exacting than Volstead Act does not constitute conflict.

The fact that a state statute or city ordinance relative to intoxicating liquors is more exacting than the Volstead Enforcement Act, or that the penalty imposed is more or less severe, does not constitute a conflict between the Volstead Act and the local statute or ordinance.

4. Intoxicating liquors ⟸17 — Express purpose of city ordinance to enforce Eighteenth Amendment cannot affect validity.

The fact that an ordinance of the city of Stockton relative to intoxicating liquors expresses the purpose to exercise the power granted by the Eighteenth Amendment of the federal Constitution cannot affect the validity of the ordinance under the California Constitution (article 11, § 11), empowering the city to prohibit traffic in intoxicating liquors; the expression of purpose being treated as surplusage.

Application for writ of habeas corpus by Cæsari Volpi against the Chief of Police of the City of Stockton to secure petitioner's release from custody after conviction of violation of a prohibition ordinance. Writ discharged.

Tye & Edwards and Walter F. Lynch, all of Stockton, for petitioner.

J. W. Hannan and M. P. Shaughnessy, both of Stockton, for respondent.

FINCH, P. J. Petitioner was convicted under an ordinance of the city of Stockton of selling intoxicating liquor containing more than one-half of 1 per cent. by volume of alcohol, and sentenced to pay a fine of $150, with the alternative of imprisonment in the county jail. Failing to pay the fine, he was imprisoned, and now seeks release by habeas corpus on the following grounds: (1) That "no power is conferred upon municipalities to enact legislation for the enforcement of the Eighteenth Amendment, and any penal ordinance by municipalities upon the subject of prohibition or its enforcement is void and in violation of said section of the Constitution; (2) that the ordinance is void, in that it conflicts with the Volstead Act."

The text of the Eighteenth Amendment is as follows:

"Section 1. After one year from the ratification of this article the manufacture, sale, or transportation of intoxicating liquors within, the importation thereof into, or the exportation thereof from the United States and all territory subject to the jurisdiction thereof for beverage purposes, is hereby prohibited.

"Sec. 2. The Congress and the several states shall have concurrent power to enforce this article by appropriate legislation."

In Rhode Island v. Palmer, 253 U. S. 350, 40 Sup. Ct. 486, 588, 64 L. Ed. 946, the Supreme Court, having under consideration the Eighteenth Amendment and the Volstead Act (41 Stat. 305), among other conclusions, announced that—

The first section of the Eighteenth Amendment "of its own force invalidates every legislative act—whether by Congress, by a state Legislature, or by a territorial assembly—which authorizes or sanctions what the section prohibits"; that the second section of the amendment "does not enable Congress or the several states to defeat or thwart the prohibition, but only to enforce it by appropriate means"; that "the words 'concurrent power' in that section do not mean joint power, or require that legislation thereunder by Congress, to be effective, shall be approved or sanctioned by the several states or any of them, nor do they mean that the power to enforce is divided between Congress and the several states along the lines which separate or distinguish foreign and interstate commerce from intrastate affairs"; that "the power confided to Congress by that section, while not exclusive, is territorially coextensive with the prohibition of the first section, * * * and is in no wise dependent on or affected by action or inaction on the part of the several states or any of them."

Since the adoption of the Eighteenth Amendment a number of state and federal courts have had occasion to pass upon questions similar to those here presented. In all of those cases convictions were upheld, whether prosecuted under state laws or municipal ordinances. In Commonwealth v. Nickerson, 236 Mass. 281, 128 N. E. 273, 10 A. L. R. 1568, the defendant was convicted under a state law enacted prior to the adoption of the Eighteenth Amendment. The court said that—

"Legislation by the states need not be identical with that of Congress. It cannot authorize that which is forbidden by Congress. But the states need not denounce every act committed within their boundaries which is included within the inhibition of the Volstead Act, nor provide the same penalties therefor. It is conceivable also that a state may forbid under penalty acts not prohibited by the act of Congress. * * * State statutes, rationally adapted to putting into execution the inexorable mandate against the sale of intoxicating liquors for beverages contained in section 1 of the amendment by different definitions, regulations, and penalties from those contained in the Volstead Act, * * * but in harmony therewith, are valid. Existing laws of that character are not suspended or superseded by the act of Congress."

In State v. District Court (Mont.) 194 Pac. 310, it was held that the adoption of the Eighteenth Amendment did not render inoperative the state prohibition law enacted prior thereto. The court said:

"In adopting the amendment, the states did not deprive themselves of the power to make laws for their internal government upon the subject of intoxicating liquors. * * * So long as legislation of a state actually seeks to enforce, by appropriate legislation, under the second section of the amendment, what is prohibited by the first, no valid objection can be made, even though the state law may differ from that of Congress. The authority of the states is not to enforce the acts of Congress, but to enforce the amendment itself."

In State v. Turner (Wash.) 196 Pac. 638, it was held that the Eighteenth Amendment and the Volstead Act do not supersede the state law upon the same subject. To the same effect is the case of U. S. v. Holt (D. C.) 270 Fed. 639. In Jones v. Hicks (Ga.) 104 S. E. 771, 11 A. L. R. 1315, it was held that—

The Eighteenth Amendment and legislation thereunder by Congress "does not impair the integrity of any existing state statute to enforce prohibition, nor can it interfere with the enactment of any future legislation by the states for that purpose."

In the case of Gilmore (Tex. Cr. App.) 228 S. W. 199, it is said that—

"The impotence of the state, in view of the federal law, to render lawful the manufacture, sale, or transportation of a beverage containing more than one-half of 1 per cent. of alcohol does not imply that the state, in the exercise of its judgment, could not elect to punish persons who dealt in intoxicants containing 1 per cent. or more of alcohol. Its refusal to punish where the percentage of alcohol was less than 1 per cent. would not obstruct or impede the right of the federal government to do so under its own law. * * * The framers of the amendment, having selected language specifically conferring upon the states concurrent power to enforce the prohibition by 'appropriate legislation,' in our opinion did not intend that the state's legislation should be identical with that of Congress. * * * Should an irreconcilable conflict develop, no doubt the provisions of the federal Constitution, making that document and the laws of Congress paramount, would prevail. But neither Congress nor the state being able to thwart the prohibition, but being empowered to enforce it, the development of such a conflict would appear remote, if not impossible. The difference in the penalty prescribed by Congress and the state would not condemn the state law as unconstitutional."

Petitioner relies upon the case of U. S. v. Peterson (D. C.) 268 Fed. 864. In that case it was held that—

"The concurrent power given to the state does not, however, authorize the state to delegate that power to municipalities. It is a power which must be exercised by the state itself."

In a later decision by the same judge, Woods v. City of Seattle (D. C.) 270 Fed. 315, involving the validity of a city ordinance prohibiting sales of intoxicating liquors which the Volstead Act and the regulations made pursuant thereto permitted, it is said:

"The plaintiff asserts that article 18, supra, and the National Prohibition Act, grant him a right to do except that which is prohibited, and that this right overrides all police power of the state with relation to intoxicants. In this the plaintiff is in error. Instead of granting a right, the amendment and the Volstead Acts are limitations upon privilege. * * * The police power of the state, therefore, is paramount where it does not authorize what the National Act prohibits, and through its inherent reserve power it has the right to legislate in such manner. The state may prohibit, but it may not authorize. The state, having this power by article 11, § 11, of the state Constitution, has granted to the defendant city police power, with a limitation that ordinances shall not be enacted in contravention of state statute. * * *

"In United States v. Peterson, supra, it was said: 'The concurrent power given to the state does not, however, authorize the state to delegate that power to municipalities. It is a power which must be exercised by the state itself.'

"Concurrent power is not an issue here. The prohibiting by national legislation of traffic in liquor with more than one-half of one per centum of alcohol by volume does not prevent the state, or the city within the granted police power, to decide upon measures that are needful for the protection of its people by prohibiting possession or delivery of intoxicants fit for beverage purposes, under the guise of innocent preparations not within the National Prohibition Act."

In Ex parte Crookshank (D. C.) 269 Fed. 980, the validity of an ordinance of the city of Bakersfield was assailed on grounds similar to those urged here. It was there contended that a municipality is without power to enact or enforce legislation in restraint of the liquor traffic, under the Eighteenth Amendment or otherwise, until the state has, by appropriate enforcement legislation, enacted subsequently to the ratification of the amendment, actually authorized such municipality so to do. In upholding the ordinance the court said:

"It may not, I think, be maintained with success that in the adoption and ratification of the Eighteenth Amendment the several states were surrendering any of the powers theretofore possessed by them, respecting their own jurisdiction to prescribe effective prohibition of that traffic. In all that was done, they were simply conferring upon the federal government the like power to prohibit, which theretofore, in virtue of its organization and the character of the powers reserved to the states, it had not possessed. * * * The state of California, as a sovereign state of the Union, by its Constitution (section 11, art. 11) has heretofore conferred upon 'any county, city, town, or township' the authority to 'make and enforce within its limits all such local, police, sanitary, and other regulations as are not in conflict with general laws.' * * * If the state of California is in receipt of any 'new' power, in virtue of the terms of section 2 of the Eighteenth Amendment, such power, it would seem, has already been appropriately conferred upon the city of Bakersfield."

[1] It is seen that the contentions of the petitioner find no support in the decisions relative to the national amendment.

The police power is inherent in the state, and is one of the necessary attributes of its sovereignty. It is not a grant from the federal government, but is reserved exclusively to the states, except as expressly surrendered by them in the manner provided by the National Constitution. No one subject has required the more constant exercise of that power than the traffic in intoxicating liquors. In the adoption of the Eighteenth Amendment there is no apparent intent to surrender this important power to the general government. By that amendment the federal government is authorized to exercise police powers theretofore exclusively within the province of the states to the extent of enforcing the provisions of the amendment. No power is given Congress to authorize the sale of intoxicating liquors, but on the contrary such authorization is expressly forbidden, both to Congress and the states. Some confusion apparently exists as to the source of the present power of the states to prohibit the traffic in intoxicants, one point of view being that it is derived solely from the second section of the Eighteenth Amendment, the other that it is an inherent power which the states have never surrendered. The latter view seems the more logical, with the qualification that the second section may confer upon the states authority relative to the importation and exportation of intoxicating liquors not theretofore possessed by them. Should the federal government and a state differently define the term "intoxicating liquors," it appears that both enactments would be equally binding upon the people of the state, the one enforceable exclusively through the federal courts, the other through the courts of the state.

[2, 3] If it be conceded that Congress is empowered to nullify a state law on the subject, still it does not appear that the Volstead Act was intended to have that effect.

"It should never be held that Congress intends to supersede or by its legislation suspend the exercise of the police powers of the states, even when it may do so, unless its purpose to effect that result is clearly manifested. This court has said—and the principle has often been reaffirmed—that 'in the application of this principle of supremacy of an act of Congress in a case where the state law is but the exercise of a reserved power, the repugnance or conflict should be direct and positive, so that the two could not be reconciled or consistently stand together.' Sinnot v. Davenport, 22 How. 227, 243 [16 L. Ed. 243, 247]." Reid v. Colorado, 187 U. S. 148, 23 Sup. Ct. 96, 47 L. Ed. 114.

The fact that the statute or ordinance of the lesser jurisdiction is more exacting, or that the penalty imposed is more or less severe, than that of the greater, does not constitute a conflict. If prosecuted under the one, a defendant is entitled to the protection which that law affords him; if under the other, his rights are governed by its provisions. In re Hoffman, 155 Cal. 114, 99 Pac. 517, 132 Am. St. Rep. 75.

[4] Section 26 of the ordinance provides, among other things, that—

"The council of the city of Stockton hereby declares that this ordinance shall be deemed to be an exercise of the power granted by the Eighteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and of the police power of the city of Stockton," etc.

Section 2 of the Eighteenth Amendment authorized the states to enforce the amendment by appropriate legislation. As said in the Crookshank Case, supra, by the provisions of article 11, § 11, of the state Constitution, the state of California has already appropriately conferred upon municipalities the power to enforce the amendment. However, if the city of Stockton is not authorized to enforce the amendment, it is by the state Constitution empowered to prohibit traffic in intoxicating liquors in the exercise of its police power. Though the expressed purpose is to enforce the provisions of the Eighteenth Amendment, that expression is not a necessary part of the ordinance, and can in no wise affect its validity. No objection is made that the ordinance, independent of the purpose expressed, is not complete in itself. Under such circumstances, the expression of purpose may be treated as surplusage. State v. Brothers, 144 Minn. 337, 175 N. W. 685.

We are not here concerned with the question whether a conviction or an acquittal under the provisions of the municipal ordinance could be pleaded in bar of a prosecution under the Volstead Act in the federal courts for the same act. In U. S. v. Peterson (D. C.) 268 Fed. 864, cited by counsel for petitioner, it was held that such a conviction would not constitute a bar. It clearly appearing that the adoption of the ordinance was within the police power of the city, its validity is not dependent upon the possibility or impossibility of a second prosecution for an act in violation thereof.

The writ is discharged and the petitioner is remanded.

COLLEGE OF OSTEOPATHIC PHYSICIANS AND SURGEONS OF LOS ANGELES v. BOARD OF MEDICAL EXAMINERS OF CALIFORNIA. (Civ. 3523.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. June 9, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 8, 1921.)

1. Physicians and surgeons ⇐3—In an action to compel the Board of Medical Examiners to approve a medical school, evidence as to the course of instruction is admissible.

In an action by a school under Medical Practice Act, § 10½, to compel the Board of Medical Examiners to approve the school so that its students, who had pursued a course of instruction therein, might be examined, evidence as to the quality of the course of instruction is admissible as bearing on the question of whether the school had complied with the requirements of section 10, and the exclusion would be reversible error, for section 10½ allows the Board of Examiners to consider the quality of the course of instruction.

2. Appeal and error ⇐1122(2) — Appellate courts cannot make findings of fact.

Appellate courts cannot make findings of fact, but they can only be made by the trial court; therefore, where the trial court, though it received material evidence, stated that it would not consider the same, but would only leave it in the record for the appellate court, such action was reversible error, for the defense could not be considered by the appellate court on the facts found with reference thereto.

3. Physicians and surgeons ⊜3—Trial court held to have received evidence as to quality of instruction.

In an action by a medical school to compel the Board of Examiners to approve it, held, in view of the circumstances at the trial, and notwithstanding a previous statement by the trial court that it would not consider the same, evidence as to the quality of the course of instruction must be considered as having been received and weighed by the trial court.

4. Appeal and error ⊜1011(1)—Finding on conflicting evidence is conclusive.

A finding by the trial court on conflicting evidence is conclusive on appeal.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Charles Wellborn, Judge.

Action by the College of Osteopathic Physicians and Surgeons of Los Angeles, a corporation, against the Board of Medical Examiners of the State of California to compel the approval of plaintiff as a medical school. From a judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Harry A. Encell, of San Francisco, and Frank M. Smith and Charles D. Ballard, both of Los Angeles, for appellant.

Jennings & Belcher, of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CONREY, P. J. Section 10 of the State Medical Practice Act, as amended by Stats. 1917, p. 99, provides that applicants for a physician and surgeon certificate, as defined in that act, shall file satisfactory evidence of having pursued, in any legally chartered school or schools approved by the Board of Medical Examiners, a course of instruction covering and including certain prescribed minimum requirements. Section 10½ (Stats. 1919, p. 1299) provides:

"Board Must Approve Schools Meeting Requirements.—Action in Event of Disapproval.—The Board must approve every school which shall comply with the requirements of section ten of this act and must admit to the examination every applicant who shall comply with the requirements of sections nine and ten of this act. Nothing in this act shall prohibit the Board from considering the quality of the course of instruction outlined in section ten hereof. If any school should be disapproved by the Board or any applicant for examination rejected by it, then such school so disapproved or such applicant so rejected may commence an action in the superior court against said Board to compel the Board to approve such school or to admit such applicant to examination or for any other appropriate relief. In any such action the court shall have full power to investigate and decide all facts anew without regard to any previous determination of the board thereon. * * *"

This is an action brought in accordance with section 10½ to compel the Board of Medical Examiners to approve the plaintiff as a school whose graudates are entitled to examination before the Board for physician and surgeon certificates, and to admit the graduates thereof to examination for those certificates. Judgment was entered in favor of the plaintiff. Defendant appeals from that judgment.

For more than four years prior to October, 1919, the students graduated by the plaintiff were regularly admitted by the defendant to examinations for physician and surgeon certificates. On the 27th day of October, 1919, the Board of Medical Examiners disapproved the college of plaintiff as an institution qualifying applicants for examination for such certificates. A few days later this action was commenced in the superior court. At the trial evidence was introduced tending to prove, and it was found by the court, that said college at all times complied with the provisions of section 10 of the State Medical Practice Act.

[1] The principal claim of error asserted by appellant is based upon the contention that the court refused to consider the quality of the course of instruction given by the plaintiff to its students, and rejected the evidence offered by appellant for the purpose of showing defects in the equipment and methods of instruction of respondent's school. We agree that appellant was entitled to introduce that evidence as a part of the evidence by which the court would determine whether or not respondent was complying with the requirements of section 10. Section 10½ does not state the purpose for which evidence of the quality of the course of instruction shall be considered, but that purpose is plain enough without direct definition. It can be nothing less than that the facts relating to the quality of such course of instruction may be considered for the purpose of determining whether or not the college applying for recognition is actually and in good faith a college giving instruction upon the subjects defined in section 10, and complying with the minimum requirements thereof. Since it is provided by section 10½ that in any such action as the present "the court shall have full power to investigate and decide all facts anew without regard to any previous determination of the Board thereon," it follows that the court should receive and consider the evidence of such facts in like manner and for the same purpose as the Board of Medical Examiners is permitted to receive and consider evidence of the same character. Therefore we are of the opinion that, if the court did reject the offered evidence, such rejection constituted error which would require a reversal of the judgment.

[2] But the evidence was not rejected. When appellant proposed to present the testimony of certain witnesses relating to the adequacy of the facilities of the college and the quality of the instruction it was able to give under existing conditions, the court suggested that for the purposes of a record on appeal—

"we might permit you to place in the record all your evidence that you have prepared, with the understanding that this court has disregarded it and considered it as rejected; but, if the higher appellate reviewing court should conclude that that rejection was error, you might have your case in a position to get a final decision from them, including the consideration of the rejected testimony. * * * For that purpose alone I will overrule the objection and permit you to put on the testimony which you have prepared; subsequently grant a motion to strike it out in such a way that it may be available to a reviewing court, in case they hold it is material. Counsel for Appellant: With that understanding, then, we will offer the testimony. The Court: With that understanding you may go ahead and take the evidence. Counsel for Appellant: At this point the objection is overruled, is it? The Court: Only in the manner I have indicated. I think that my statement makes it very clear what the ruling is."

If the court had subsequently adhered to its decision as above stated, we think the effect would have been that, although the evidence was introduced in form, it was rejected in fact. The court was in error in its assumption that this would have enabled a higher court to act upon the evidence if it found that the evidence had been erroneously rejected. Findings of fact are made only by the trial court. Under our practice the Courts of Appeal are not authorized to make or change findings of fact.

[3, 4] But the matter does not end there. After the defendant had rested, and after the plaintiff had introduced evidence in rebuttal, counsel for appellant inquired concerning the court's ruling "in respect to section 10½." The court replied:

"I am afraid, if it takes the course of a formal order of removing it by striking it out, it will preclude any reviewing court from considering it at all. The safer plan is to overrule the objection, and deny the motion to strike out and leave it in the record, together with the evidence, if there be by counsel considered any in rebuttal, and let the reviewing court consider whether or not there was error in the admission of it rather than error in the rejection. It amounts to very little one way or the other, having heard it now. The testimony has not taken the lines that I rather anticipated it would when the ruling was first made, and such evidence as has been introduced perhaps had better be allowed to remain, especially in view of the fact that the complaint and the answer will necessitate findings which will cover the points involved just as absolutely as any order made to strike out or to refuse to strike out that evidence would cover. What I want to accomplish, if possible, is to get your matter finally determined on one review rather than on some side issue such as striking out a bit of evidence."

It thus appears that the court, contrary to its first intention, refused to strike out the evidence in question; and the evidence, having been thus accepted, comes to us as a part of the evidence received and considered by the court in making its findings of fact. We hold that the evidence was properly received, since the rejection thereof would have been erroneous. Since the evidence is conflicting, and the court has made a finding that respondent at all times complied with the provisions of section 10 of the State Medical Practice Act, we are bound by that decision.

The judgment is affirmed.

WHITE v. GREENWOOD et al. (Civ. 3377.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. May 24, 1921.)

1. Exchange of property ⟸8(4) — Evidence held insufficient to show mistake in contract as to property included therein.

A contract provided for the exchange of plaintiff's fruit land and enumerated personal property "situated upon" such land, including "all trays and boxes," for certain lands owned by defendant. At the execution of the contract a portion of the fruit trays belonging to plaintiff were not on his land, having been loaned to a neighbor. Plaintiff denied that it was his understanding that the loaned trays went with the property, though the evidence showed that defendant, as a part of the transaction, assumed payment of a chattel mortgage on all trays owned by plaintiff. Held, on the evidence, that the trays which were not on the land did not pass to defendant under Civ. Code, § 3399, providing for relief in case of a mutual mistake of the parties or a mistake of the one party which the other knew or suspected.

2. Evidence ⟸433(6)—Parties to exchange of lands and personalty may show negotiations on issue of mistake.

Where a contract for exchange of lands and personal property covered eight pages of typewritten matter and indicated that the negotiations leading to its culmination were very long, and a dispute arose as to the personal property intended to be included, the parties were entitled to go fully into the negotiations to aid the court in determining whether there was a mistake in setting forth the terms, and whether it was intended to include personal property not situated on the land at the time of the exchange.

3. Appeal and error ⇐1011(1)—A conflict of evidence precluding disturbance of judgment must be a substantial conflict.

While a finding will not be disturbed on appeal if there is a substantial conflict in the evidence from which it springs, the evidence, in order to raise a conflict, must be such as to present a fair and reasonable ground for a difference of opinion.

4. Contracts ⇐147(1)—Enforcement according to intent held improper without reformation.

A contract which does not express the intention of the parties cannot be enforced according to the claimed intention without first reforming it to make it express such intention.

5. Set-off and counterclaim ⇐29(3)—In action for conversion, a claim for excessive interest paid held not proper counterclaim.

Where plaintiff and defendant exchanged lands and certain personal property thereon, and plaintiff sued defendant for the conversion of items of personal property which plaintiff claimed were not included in the contract of exchange, a counterclaim by defendant based on the fact that he was compelled to pay past-due interest on a mortgage assumed by him as a part of the exchange contract did not arise out of the transaction involved in the suit within Code Civ. Proc. § 438, providing that a counterclaim must arise out of the transaction set forth in the complaint as the foundation of plaintiff's claim or connected with the subject of the action.

6. Set-off and counterclaim ⇐34(1)—In action for conversion counterclaim based on contract is bad.

Where plaintiff and defendant exchanged lands and certain personal property situated on such lands, and plaintiff sued defendant for conversion of items of personal property which plaintiff claimed was not included in the contract, a counterclaim by defendant to recover past-due interest on a loan assumed by him as a part of the transaction did not come within Code Civ. Proc. § 438, on the ground that it was a cause of action arising upon contract and existing at the time of filing the complaint, and that the complaint was also upon an action arising on contract, since the action was one based on tort, while the counterclaim was based on contract.

Appeal from Superior Court, Kings County; H. Z. Austin, Judge.

Action by S. J. White against B. S. Greenwood and another. Judgment for defendants both on complaint and counterclaim, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed and remanded.

W. R. McQuiddy, of Hanford, for appellant.

Harris & Hayhurst, of Fresno, and John G. Covert, of Hanford, for respondents.

WORKS, J. This is an action for the conversion of 2,000 fruit trays, in which the defendants presented a counterclaim for one hundred dollars. The defendants had judgment that plaintiff take nothing, and also judgment as prayed for under the counterclaim. The plaintiff appeals.

Appellant was the owner of real property in Kings county and respondents owned real property in Fresno county. They entered into a written agreement for the exchange of their respective holdings, as well as for the exchange of certain personal property. We set forth the portion of the instrument which is of present interest, our italics showing the particular language bearing upon the question we are to determine:

"The following described personal property now situated upon said real property in Kings county is to go with said property in this transfer and to be considered a part of the same, to wit: Four (4) mules and harness for the same; one spraying outfit and its truck; all trays and boxes; two (2) sows; one (1) cow; one section harrow; one rotary harrow; two 12-inch plows; one 10-inch plow; one small gang plow; one four-horse wagon; capitol wagon; one vineyard truck; all tree props and hooks; all hay in barns; all panels and woven wire fences now on the ranch; also one light buggy, yellow gear."

At the time of the exchange of properties between the parties appellant was the owner of 2,000 fruit trays which had been formerly used on the "said real property in Kings county," but they were then on a certain ranch which was the property of one Marlow, who had rented or borrowed them from appellant. After the exchange respondents took possession of these trays, claiming title to them under the agreement for exchange. Appellant then commenced this action for the conversion of the 2,000 trays.

In their amended answer respondents allege, "as a counterclaim," that at the time the agreement for exchange was executed the parties intended that all the trays which had been used in connection with the Kings county place, including the 2,000, were to be sold and delivered to respondents, but by mistake of the parties the trays were described as those then on the premises, and that appellant at the time well knew that respondents understood that the 2,000 trays were included in the exchange. In their briefs the parties treat this allegation as if it were interposed as a defense to the complaint, instead of being put forth merely as matter in support of the counterclaim, and we shall likewise so consider it. The trial court found with respondents on the issue of mistake, and appellant insists that the finding is not supported by the evidence.

[1] Appellant testified at the trial on cross-examination by respondents' counsel, that the

2,000 trays had not been sold to respondents, and that he (appellant) had not understood that they were included in the trade. The testimony of respondent B. S. Greenwood was that at the time the exchange was negotiated he asked appellant how many trays he had, and the answer was, "seventeen thousand." The witness then remarked:

"That was really all that was said regarding the trays until we drew the contract."

The examination then proceeded:

"Q. Well, how many trays did you actually find on the place, including these 2,000? A. Around 15,000."

And, after the witness had stated his "understanding" at the time the contract was made, ruled out as a conclusion, this transpired:

"Q. What do you mean by your understanding? Where did you get your understanding? A. All I got was from what Mr. White said in regard to the number. * * * Q. I will ask you * * * if Mr. White ever at any time mentioned the fact that he had rented these trays out to a neighbor and they were not right at that time on his ranch? A. No, sir. * * * Q. How many trays were actually on the ranch when you went on it? A. About 13,000. Q. These 2,000 would make 15,000. A. About 15,000; I never counted them exactly, but I would simply judge by what I had rented out and the counts that were made by the parties who hauled them away, after I went on the ranch."

A circumstance which respondent points to as aiding to support the finding that there was a mistake is this: At the time of the exchange of properties a certain third person held a mortgage on the trays, both those on appellant's Kings county ranch and the 2,000 on the Marlow place. Under the agreement for exchange respondents assumed and agreed to pay this obligation, and they afterward did pay it. Respondents also contend that the 2,000 trays were a necessary part of the equipment of appellant's ranch, and that they went with the land in the exchange for that reason; and appellant did testify that he "had to use them in connection with" the place.

We can see no evidence in the record supporting the finding of mistake. The testimony which we have quoted tends to show neither "a mutual mistake of the parties" nor "a mistake of one party, which the other at the time knew or suspected." Civ. Code, § 3399. In considering the fact that respondents agreed to pay the outstanding mortgage on the trays including the 2,000, we need only refer to the language of the court (White v. Greenwood, 40 Cal. App. 113, 180 Pac. 45) in disposing of the cause on a former appeal:

"It cannot be said that merely because one, as part of the consideration of a purchase, assumes and agrees to pay a mortgage on personal property, he is entitled to the property."

[2] The contention of respondents that the 2,000 trays were a part of the exchange because they were a necessary part of the equipment of appellant's property deserves a more particular mention. It may be that the parties intended that the entire equipment of the ranch should be included in the exchange, but the evidence does not show that fact. If it did, the situation might be different. The portions of the record referred to in the briefs as bearing upon the question of mistake are very meager. Considering that fact and considering that this is the second appeal of the cause, we have not been content with relying upon counsels' references to parts of the record, but have read it in full with great care. The references in the briefs to the testimony upon the question of mistake are meager, because the testimony on the subject is scant, is almost negligible. The exchange contracted for between the parties was an important one. The real properties involved were of considerable value. On both sides they were subject to various incumbrances. The agreement is long, comprising over eight pages in the typewritten record, and it was evidently prepared with care. In short, the nature of the transaction was such that, of necessity, the parties must have gone through an extended negotiation in order to bring it to a culmination. On the trial they were entitled to go fully into the negotiations in order to aid the trial court in determining whether there was a mistake in the matter of the trays. It is unfortunate that they did not do so, whatever the result may have been.

We have gone over the entire agreement for exchange in an endeavor to ascertain the true state of affairs, but, with the exception of a single clause which we shall mention below, the instrument throughout seems to evince an intent to carry into the exchange only the personal properties actually on the appellant's ranch, as well as on a ranch of respondents which figured in the exchange. The agreement first described the ranch owned by appellant. Following that, it described the properties of respondents, lying in two parcels. It then provides that the parties "agree to exchange their respective properties with each other upon the following terms and conditions." The reference to their "respective properties" plainly contemplates the realty, as personalty has not yet been mentioned; the consequence being that the exchange of the personal property was but an incident to the transfers of the real property. The instrument then recites that the "property together with the personal property thereon, as hereinafter enumerated," and belonging to appellant was of a certain value. Then follows a listing of the various incumbrances on both sides and provisions for their disposition and for the giving of new mortgages. Next comes the paragraph set forth in the early part of this opinion, followed by several other paragraphs on various subjects. At the close of the agreement is a paragraph to the effect that "the following is a description of the personal property situated upon said forty acres in Fresno County, agreed to be conveyed by" respondents "and which goes with said property and is to be considered a part, to wit: One mower; one cultivator." This last provision is of considerable significance, for it is not to be supposed that these two implements were the entire personal property equipment of the 40 acres.

We have above mentioned a single clause in the agreement which is favorable to the contention of respondents. It is recited that the mortgage on the trays, which respondents assumed and agreed to pay, was "on the trays on said premises," meaning the Kings county ranch of appellant, although, as already noted, it actually covered the 2,000 trays on the Marlow place. This single recital cannot avail respondents. It is of no weight whatever when placed beside the plain and positive provisions of the agreement to the effect that the personalty exchanged was at the time of the execution of the instrument actually situated upon the ranch.

[3] While a finding will not be disturbed on appeal if there is a substantial conflict in the evidence from which it springs, "the evidence, in order to raise a conflict, must be such as to present a fair and reasonable ground for a difference of opinion." Field v. Shorb, 99 Cal. 661, 34 Pac. 504; Felsenthal v. Warring, 40 Cal. App. 119, 180 Pac. 67. The matter we are now discussing comes within this rule.

We are convinced, on the whole, that the record fails to show a mistake. The finding of the trial court on that issue is without support in the evidence.

[4] As the cause must be remanded, it is proper now to notice a state of the record which is not mentioned in the briefs and which will affect the conduct of the cause on a retrial, if a retrial is to be had. Laying aside the point that the allegation of mistake in the amended answer is apparently made in support of the counterclaim only, a circumstance which we have already pointed out, it is to be noted that the pleading contains no prayer for a reformation of the agreement for exchange because of the alleged mistake. If we overlook that circumstance and concede that relief which is not prayed for in a pleading may be granted if the facts alleged will warrant, we are to note that here there is no judgment for reformation. "A contract which does not express the intention of the parties cannot be enforced according to their intention without first reforming it to make it express such intention." De Witt v. Duncan, 46 Cal. 342; Third Street Imp. Co. v. McLelland, 23 Cal. App. 369, 137 Pac. 1089. This circumstance alone necessitates a reversal, but we have thought it best first to pass upon the sufficiency of the evidence upon the question of mistake, as much that we have said on that subject will be useful on a retrial, and further because the point we now present was not raised by counsel.

[5, 6] We now consider the judgment rendered in favor of respondents upon their counterclaim. The agreement for exchange of properties required respondents to pay a certain mortgage outstanding against appellant's property and interest falling due thereon after a particular date, appellant to pay interest due before that date. Respondents' counterclaim is based upon the alleged payment of $100 as and for interest accrued prior to the date mentioned and seeks from appellant a reimbursement in the amount named.

Under Code of Civil Procedure, § 438, a counterclaim may be filed only: First upon a cause of action arising out of the transaction set forth in the complaint as the foundation of the plaintiff's claim, or connected with the subject of the action; second, on a cause of action arising upon the contract and existing at the time of filing the complaint, where the complaint is also upon an action arising on contract. The alleged counterclaim of respondents is not within either of these classes. It does not come within the first, because the transaction upon which the action is based is the conversion of the fruit trays, and either the trays themselves or the facts constituting appellant's cause of action for their recovery are the subject of the action. 34 Cyc. 688. The counterclaim does not arise out of that transaction, nor is it connected with that subject of action. It does not come within the second, because the action of conversion sounds in tort (26 R. C. L. p. 1098, par. 3; French v. Robbins, 172 Cal. 670, 158 Pac. 188), while the alleged counterclaim sounds in contract being based upon the implied promise of appellant to reimburse respondents for the payment they claim to have made.

The judgment is reversed and the cause is remanded for further proceedings in accordance with this opinion.

KEMP v. VAN BEZEL et al. (two cases). (Civ. 3547, 3548.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. June 24, 1921.)

1. Carriers ⟸318(7)—Evidence held sufficient to show negligence of motor bus driver at railroad crossing.

In actions against the owner of a motor bus for injuries to two passengers in a collision with a railroad engine at a crossing, evidence held to make a sufficient case of negligence on part of the bus driver.

2. Damages ⟸131(3)—$500 not excessive where husband expended over $400 for medical attendance for injured wife, and suffered minor bruises, lacerations, temporary unconsciousness and nervous shock himself.

Where a husband, who with his wife was a passenger in a motor bus struck by an engine at a railroad crossing, suffered minor bruises, two lacerations of the arm, one of which had to be sewed up by a surgeon, was rendered unconscious for a few minutes, suffered a nervous shock, from which he did not recover for a week, and expended more than $400 for medical attendance for his wife, who was more seriously injured, a judgment for $500, being less than $100 as general damages, disregarding the loss of the wife's society and service, was not excessive.

3. Damages ⟸132(14)—$2,500 not excessive for severe injuries to head, eye, nose, lip, and thigh, several weeks' confinement to bed, inability to walk without assistance thereafter, etc.

A verdict for $2,500 for personal injuries, consisting of a blow on the head, first thought to be a fracture, a contusion over an eye, which became bloodshot and sightless, a contusion on the back of the head, cuts on the nose and upper lip, the latter requiring stitching, a deep bruise in the thigh, a dazed condition the morning after the accident, confinement to bed or wheel chair for four weeks, inability to walk without assistance for eight or nine weeks, eye trouble necessitating a consultation with a specialist, and bad health for about two years, accompanied by nervousness and irritability and pain in the head and leg, was not excessive.

4. Trial ⟸260(1)—Refusal of instructions covered by others not error.

Refusal of requested instructions covered by instructions given is not error.

5. Damages ⟸216(1)—Instruction to consider pain and suffering sustained and likely to be sustained, impairment of health, strength, and activity and other injuries, and to award fair damages, not exceeding amount prayed for, held proper.

In an action against a motor bus owner for injuries to a passenger in a collision with an engine at a railroad crossing, an instruction to take into consideration in estimating the damage, the pain and suffering sustained by plaintiff, and that which it was reasonably certain she would sustain thereafter, the impairment of her health, strength, and activity, and any other injuries received, and to award such damages as the jury considered fair, not exceeding the amount prayed for in the complaint, was not error.

6. Appeal and error ⟸1033(5)—Omission in instruction favorable to complaining party harmless.

In an action against a motor bus owner for injuries to a passenger in a collision with an engine at a railroad crossing, an instruction that a common carrier owes to his passengers the duty of exercising the highest degree of care was not erroneous, though it omitted the words, "and must exercise to that end a reasonable degree of skill," the concluding clause of Civ. Code, § 2100, such clause imposing an additional burden on carriers, so that its omission from the instruction was more favorable to defendant than would have been its inclusion.

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Chas. Monroe, Judge.

Action by Charles A. Kemp and one by his wife, Helen M. Kemp, against Frank Van Bezel and another. Judgment for plaintiffs, and defendant Van Bezel appeals. Affirmed.

Duke Stone, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

T. A. Williams, of Los Angeles, for respondents.

WORKS, J. These two actions were for the recovery of damages for personal injuries suffered in a collision between a motor bus owned and operated by defendant Van Bezel and a switch engine of defendant corporation. The plaintiffs, who were husband and wife, were passengers in the motor bus. Under stipulation the two actions were tried together by a jury. Plaintiffs had judgment against defendant Van Bezel, and he appeals.

[1] The first contention of appellant is that there was no sufficient evidence of negligence on his part. The accident occurred at the intersection of Seventh and Alameda streets, in a thickly built industrial district of Los Angeles. A brick building stood at the right of the motor bus as it approached the intersection, obscuring the view of the driver toward the direction from which the switch engine came. The driver of the bus and some others testified that the engine gave no signal or warning as it approached, and that it bore no lights, the accident having occurred between 12 and 1 o'clock at night; but there was much evidence to the contrary. The driver of an automobile, which was 75 feet behind the bus at the crossing having just been passed by it, testified that as the bus "came to the intersection it was going about 20 miles an hour." This witness did not see a headlight, but he did see the "body of the engine" as it came from behind the brick building, and heard its bells ringing. The fireman on the switch engine testified:

"The engine was equipped with headlights on both ends. Just prior to the accident there was as good headlights as on any switch engine. They were not lighted with electric lights. They were carbide lights. Part of the fender of the bus came up through the cab window, and put the lights out of commission. It pushed the can loose and connection loose, so that the lights went out. The bell was ringing at the time of the accident."

The testimony of the engineer corroborated that of the fireman. This evidence made a sufficient case of negligence on the part of the driver of the bus.

[2] The husband had judgment for $500 and the wife for $2,500. Appellant insists that these awards were excessive. The complaint of the husband was in two counts, the one for general damages, the other for special damages in the expenditure of moneys for the hire of nurses and for the services of physicians and the like, and for the loss of the society and service of the wife. Under this claim for special damages the proof showed the actual payment by the husband of various bills aggregating more than $400. The jury therefore allowed him, if we disregard the item of loss of the wife's society and service, less than $100 as general damages. His injuries consisted of minor bruises and two lacerations of the arm, one of which was four inches in length and had to be sewed up by a surgeon. He was rendered unconscious for a few minutes by the accident, and suffered a nervous shock from which he did not recover for a week. The jury was amply justified in allowing him judgment for $500.

[3] The wife's injuries were severe, and for an account of them we look to portions of the evidence recited in appellant's brief. She received a blow on the head from which it was thought a fracture had resulted, but, as it transpired later, this was a mistake. There was a contusion over her right eye, the eye was bloodshot and a doctor testified he could get no vision from it; there was a contusion on the back of the head, a cut on the nose, a cut on the upper lip which required stitching to close the mouth, and there was a deep bruise in the middle of the right thigh. She was in a dazed condition the next morning after the accident, and was confined to her bed or to a wheel chair for about four weeks, did not walk without assistance for eight or nine weeks and not at all for seven weeks. She had trouble with her eye for several months, and had to consult a specialist about it. Her health was good before the accident, but was very bad from the date of the occurrence up to the time of the trial, a period of about two years; and during that time she was nervous and irritable. As late as the time of trial she complained of pain in her head and leg, and the leg required rubbing to alleviate the pain in that member. We are far from being able to say that a verdict of $2,500 under such circumstances was excessive.

[4] Appellant requested two certain instructions which were refused, and it is claimed that the refusal to give them was error. It is enough to say, upon this point, that the subject-matter of the requested instructions was covered by instructions which were given.

[5] The court gave an instruction in this language:

"In estimating the damage to Helen M. Kemp, you are to take into consideration the pain and suffering, if any, which she has sustained, and which it is reasonably certain that she may sustain hereafter, the impairment of her health, strength, and activity, and any other injuries she may have received, and award her damages as, in your judgment, shall be fair, not exceeding the sum of $10,000;" that being the amount prayed for in her complaint.

Appellant contends that the instruction was erroneous, and cites Melone v. Sierra Railway Co., 151 Cal. 113, 91 Pac. 522, in support of his view; but the Supreme Court in that case approved an instruction in the form given by the trial court. The difficulty there was that another instruction had also been given on the same subject; the two taken together being conflicting. The court reversed the judgment because it could not be determined which of the contradictory instructions had guided the jury. The instruction given by the trial court was proper.

[6] An instruction was given to the effect that, "A common carrier of passengers owes to his passengers the duty of exercising the highest degree of care in safely carrying his passengers throughout their journey," together with other matter not necessary to be noted. Section 2100 of the Civil Code contains language substantially like that given to the jury, but concludes with the clause, "and must exercise to that end a reasonable degree of skill." Appellant contends that the instruction was erroneous without the substance of these closing words of the Code section. The omission of these words, however, is not one of which appellant may complain, as it has been determined that the closing portion of section 2100 imposes an additional burden on carriers. Fisher v. Southern Pac. R. Co., 89 Cal. 399, 26 Pac. 894. The omission from the instruction of the language mentioned, granting that in a legal sense it may be called an omission, was more favorable to appellant than would have been its inclusion.

Judgment affirmed in each case.

ACKERMAN v. CHANNEL COMMERCIAL CO. (Civ. 3313.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 2, California. June 17, 1921. Rehearing Denied July 15, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 15, 1921.)

1. Evidence ⟸400(3)—Complete written contract not superseded by former oral statements.

A complete written contract, consisting of a sale of goods, could not be superseded by former oral statements between the parties and could not be varied by them, under Civ. Code, § 1625

2. Principal and agent ⟸132(1)—Principal bound by contract signed by agent.

Purchaser named in order for goods was bound by the order, although it was signed, "Purchaser, J. A. S."; evidence showing that J. A. S. was acting within the scope of his authority when affixing his signature.

3. Sales ⟸365—Findings of fact held to sustain judgment for seller.

In an action by seller to recover price of goods, findings of execution of a written contract, delivery of goods thereunder, demand for payment, and refusal of the defendant to pay were sufficient, and a lack of other findings upon other and immaterial facts was not ground for reversal.

4. Sales ⟸187—Plaintiff seller held entitled to interest.

In an action to recover purchase price of goods, where defendant set up counterclaim, and there was no dispute concerning the amount found due the plaintiff, and the amount owing from the plaintiff to the defendant being only a matter of computation, plaintiff was entitled to interest for the difference between the amount of its claim and that of the defendant.

5. Principal and agent ⟸137(1) — Principal has right to dispute authority of agent.

In an action to recover purchase price of goods, where defendant asked for affirmative relief based upon an alleged oral contract entered into between him and the agent of the seller entirely separate from the one alleged in plaintiff's complaint, plaintiff had a right to dispute the authority of the agent to enter into the oral agreement.

6. Principal and agent ⟸150(2)—Verbal arrangements made by salesman not binding on principal.

Verbal arrangement made by a salesman outside the scope of his agency is not his principal's contract, and the principal is not bound thereby.

7. Principal and agent ⟸120(1)—Order blank held material in action to recover price of goods.

In action to recover price of goods, where defendant counterclaimed upon verbal agreement with plaintiff's agent, an order blank used by the plaintiff and exhibited to defendant's agent when the order was taken was material and relevant as tending to show that plaintiff's agent had no authority to enter into the oral agreement.

8. Evidence ⟸471(28)—Question as to making of contract held objectionable as calling for conclusion.

In an action to recover price of goods, court erred in not sustaining an objection as calling for a conclusion of the witness to the question, "I will ask you now what, if any agreement you ever made, or authorized your brother, J., to make with C. Company [the defendant] for the sale of these goods other than written contracts between the wholesalers and retailers."

Appeal from Superior Court, Los Angeles County; Leslie R. Hewitt, Judge.

Action by J. H. Ackerman, doing business under the fictitious name of the Volrox Manufacturing Company, against the Channel Commercial Company. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Edward M. Selby, of Los Angeles, for appellant.

H. S. Laughlin and Muhleman & Crump, all of Los Angeles, for respondent.

CRAIG, J. The appeal in this case is based upon alleged error in ruling upon the admission of testimony, and the claim that the findings are not supported by the evidence. The court rendered judgment against the defendant on the complaint for $538.65, and for the defendant on the counterclaim for $70.63. The action is for goods, wares, and merchandise sold and delivered, and the counterclaim is for commissions earned under contract. Plaintiff was a manufacturer of a polish and did business under the name of "Volrox Manufacturing Company." Defendant was engaged in the wholesale grocery business. The court found that on or about October 10, 1918, plaintiff sold to defendant 70 cases of "Volrox" for $538.65, to be delivered to the defendant in Los Angeles; that plaintiff and defendant entered into an agreement by which defendant was to act as the sole distributor of "Volrox" in a certain territory, and that the defendant was to receive 5 per cent. of the selling price of any of the polish which the plaintiff might sell therein except to the defendant; that plaintiff sold $1,407.55 worth of the polish to others than defendant, which was the basis of the court's judgment for the defendant on the counterclaim.

We will first consider the appellant's arguments as applied to the record on appeal pertaining to the cause of action alleged in the complaint and the defendant's answer thereto. Later the question presented by the counterclaim will be passed upon. The plaintiff's case is based upon a written agreement, signed by the Channel Commercial Company through its buyer, Smith, concerning the 70 cases of polish for which the court gave judgment. This agreement was as follows:

"Wholesale Order Book—Duplicate. Volrox Manufacturing Co., Manufacturers and Jobbers of Volrox Polish, Los Angeles, California. Chicago, Ill. Date 10—12, 1918. Sold to Channel Com'l. Co. Mail address, Channel Com'l. Co. Shipping point, Channel Com'l. Co. Shipped by warehouse stock when

"Less 10% and 5%.
"F. o. b. warehouse.
"Purchaser, F. A. Smith.
"Salesman, J. W. Ackerman.

"Any agreement as to resale of this order, either verbal or written, not to effect terms of payment. We treat this order as a contract, no verbal statement recognized. Terms——2% cash 10 days from date of invoice. 30 days net. Sight draft when due.
"Read carefully before signing."

[1, 2] According to uncontradicted evidence, J. W. Ackerman held a conversation with Smith, the buyer of defendant, in which J. W. Ackerman made certain statements and promises. Subsequently the above instrument was executed. Smith testified that he did not read it before signing, and that he must have done so through carelessness. The oral representations were merged in the written agreement. It was a contract and was binding upon the parties even if J. W. Ackerman had been authorized to make verbal alterations in the written forms provided by his company and though he had done so previously. This writing, being a complete contract in itself, superseded any former oral statements, if any were made, and could not be varied by them. Civ. Code, § 1625; Harrison v. McCormick, 89 Cal. 327, 26 Pac. 830, 23 Am. St. Rep. 469. We are not unmindful of the fact that the contract was signed, "Purchaser, J. A. Smith." Appellant has not disclaimed Smith's authority or that it is bound by this signature, and it could not well do so, because the uncontradicted evidence appearing elsewhere in the record establishes that in executing the above contract he was acting within the scope of his authority, and that he was in fact exercising that authority in affixing his signature. Under such circumstances the principal is bound. Montgomery v. Dorn, 25 Cal. App. 666, 145 Pac. 148; Southern Pac. Co. v. Von Schmidt Dredge Co. et al., 118 Cal. 368, 50 Pac. 650.

It appears that subsequent to the delivery of the goods under the contract above set forth J. H. Ackerman attempted to secure payment for them. The negotiations in that regard finaly culminated in a meeting at which were present J. H. Ackerman, J. W. Ackerman, C. H. Ackerman, E. S. Wright, and F. A. Smith. As to what was said upon this occasion there is a conflict in the evidence, but the court apparently accepted J. H. Ackerman's testimony concerning it, which was that Smith and Wright said that they did not care to keep the 77 cases and suggested that plaintiff take them back, to which proposition he agreed. Thereupon Wright said he would deliver them in the next two or three days. It appears from the testimony of J. C. Williams, an employee of the defendant company, that after the conversation just related, when the truck of the plaintiff called for the 77 cases, the defendant did not have them on hand and did not deliver them. The trial court apparently treated the arrangement for the redelivery of the 77 cases as a modification of the written contract, but one which was not carried out by the defendant, and the evidence does not disclose that the defendant, upon any occasion, did anything toward returning these cases.

From the foregoing it follows that the testimony bearing upon the scope of the authority of J. W. Ackerman, as plaintiff's agent, was immaterial to any issue tendered in plaintiff's complaint and joined by defendant's answer.

[3] The proof was ample as to the execution of the written contract, the delivery of the goods thereunder, demand for payment, and that the defendant had failed and refused to pay. The findings that allegations of these facts were true are sufficient and a lack of other findings upon other and immaterial facts are not ground for a reversal.

[4] It is claimed that the judgment for plaintiff should not have included interest because there were items on both sides of the account. Section 1917, Civil Code, is cited to sustain this contention. The court gave judgment for 7 per cent, interest from the date of the execution of the contract. There was no dispute concerning the amount found due the plaintiff, as to the number of cases delivered to defendant, nor as to the price to be paid for them. The same was true with reference to the amount owing from the plaintiff to the defendant; that is, it was only a matter of computation. The total sum owing from the defendant to the plaintiff could readily be ascertained by subtracting the amount of $70.43 from $538.65. Under such circumstances the plaintiff should have judgment for the interest. Robinson v. American Fish, etc., Co., 17 Cal. App. 212, 119 Pac. 388.

We now proceed to the counterclaim and the findings and rulings that concern it.

The court found further:

"That all the allegations of plaintiff's complaint are true except as herein found, and that all of the allegations of defendant's answer and counterclaim are untrue except as herein expressly found to be true."

It thereby found the defendant's allegation "that J. W. Ackerman was the duly authorized agent of plaintiff" to be untrue. J. H. Ackerman, the plaintiff, testified that it was the duty of J. W. Ackerman "to make arrangements with wholesalers and jobbers for the handling of this product"; "that he was to attend to the selling end of this business." J. W. Ackerman testified that in the conversations he had with J. H. Ackerman, his brother, it was understood that he was to have charge of handling the jobbers and that J. H. Ackerman was to do the manufacturing. While other testimony given might be construed to limit the agent's authority, in view of the uncontradicted testimony of both J. H. and J. W. Ackerman that J. W. Ackerman represented the plaintiff, there seems to be no basis for the finding of the court that he did not.

[5, 6] It is alleged in the counterclaim, and the court found it to be a fact, that J. W. Ackerman, representing the plaintiff, entered into a contract with defendant by which defendant was to act as the sole and exclusive distributor of "Volrox" in the territory in which defendant had its business. The counterclaim also states that it was further agreed that, should any purchaser return "Volrox" distributed to him, the plaintiff would remove the same from defendant's warehouse and repay defendant the entire purchase price of the returned goods. This last allegation the court finds to be untrue. Without here quoting the testimony, it may be fairly said that it appears from the evidence that such promise was made by J. W. Ackerman, but the plaintiff claims that this agent had no authority to make this and certain other promises. The defendant, in this phase of the case, is asking for affirmative relief. He based his claim upon an alleged oral contract entirely separate from the one alleged in the plaintiff's complaint. The plaintiff, therefore, had a right to dispute the authority of J. W. Ackerman as his agent; to show, if he could, that the representations made, as alleged, were outside the scope of the agent's authority. J. H. Ackerman testified:

"What had been said between us as to the method of introducing and selling these goods to the trade was just he would sell to the trade on these order blanks."

And also:

"My brother did not tell me the terms of any agreement which he had entered into with Mr. Smith; no one else told me; I first discovered that my brother had made an arrangement with defendant other than a written agreement when we three brothers called on Mr. Smith and Mr. Wright in regard to payment of the 77 cases; I told them he had exceeded his authority."

When asked:

"What, if anything, did you say to your brother at the time he called on the Channel Commercial Company to sell these goods; did you have a conversation with reference to the sale of the goods to the Channel Commercial Company, with your brother?"

J. H. Ackerman replied:

"Nothing in particular, other than he was to go and sell them merchandise, receive an order."

This evidence is sufficient to support the court's finding that the allegations in the answer concerning the existence of a verbal agreement were untrue. Even if the conversation related by J. W. Ackerman and Wright took place, it could not bind the plaintiff. A verbal arrangement made by a salesman, outside the scope of his agency, is not his principal's contract. It was within the province of the trial court to accept J. H. Ackerman's version of the employment of J. W. Ackerman, and the limitations that had been placed upon his authority.

Appellant complains that the court's finding that the allegation of the counterclaim "that plaintiff has not paid for the goods returned" is not true is not supported by the evidence. This finding is immaterial because the court had first determined that J. W. Ackerman's agreement that returned goods should be paid by plaintiff was outside of the agent's authority, and that plaintiff had made no agreement to pay for such returned articles.

[7, 8] It is next alleged that several rulings of the court overruling and sustaining objections were erroneous. The objection to the offer of plaintiff's exhibit No. 1—the contract for 77 cases of "Volrox"—should have been sustained. At the time the ruling was made the foundation had not been fully laid. However, the foundation was subsequently supplied, and defendant's manager, Smith, admitted the execution of the contract. It is urged that the court erred in overruling defendant's objection to the introduction of plaintiff's Exhibit No. 2. This was one of the order blanks used by the "Volrox Manufacturing Company" and exhibited to Smith when the first order was taken by defendant, and which plaintiff's salesman, J. W. Ackerman, was required to use in making sales. It tended to contradict that part of the counterclaim based upon the supposed verbal agreement between J. W. Ackerman and the defendant. The objection was that the exhibit was irrelevant and immaterial. This objection was clearly untenable. The following question asked by counsel for the plaintiff was objected to on the ground, among others, that it called for a conclusion of the witness, etc.:

"I will ask you now what, if any, agreement you ever made, or authorized your brother, J. W. Ackerman, to make with Channel Commercial Company for the sale of these goods other than written contracts between the wholesalers and retailers."

The objection should have been sustained, but that part of answer which consisted of a conclusion may be disregarded and still the plaintiff's case be unaffected. Without discussing each ruling on the admission of evidence relied upon for reversal, it is sufficient to say that the substantial rights of the defendant were unaffected by them.

The judgment is affirmed.

MINIUM v. MINIUM. (Civ. 3627.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. June 3, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 1, 1921.)

1. Divorce ⟸322 — Decree not determining rights as to community property does not preclude subsequent action.

A divorce decree in which community property is not mentioned, no issue as to such property being made in the pleadings, does not preclude a subsequent action to determine rights as to property alleged to have belonged to the community.

2. Husband and wife ⟸252 — Government homestead held not community property; "gift."

Where the husband and wife had separated when the husband initiated an entry on a homestead, and remained separate until the wife procured a divorce, two years before the final proof and receipt of patent, the land is not community property, but the property of the husband, since a government homestead is property acquired by "gift" within Civ. Code, §§ 162–164.

[Ed. Note.—For other definitions, see Words and Phrases, First and Second Series, Gift.]

3. Husband and wife ⟸252 — Government homestead procured by husband with money borrowed from wife held not community property.

The fact that a wife lends her husband money to use in making an entry on public land for a homestead does not make the homestead community property.

Appeal from Superior Court, Riverside County; Hugh H. Craig, Judge.

Action by Mary E. Loeber, revived in the name of La Rey C. Minium, administratrix of her estate, against Charles Minium. From an order sustaining a demurrer to the amended complaint, plaintiff appeals. Affirmed.

Frank C. Collier, John Schlegel, Louis F. Laberere, and W. H. Sprague, all of Los Angeles, for appellant.

F. E. Dunlap and Cedric E. Johnson, both of Los Angeles, for respondent.

KERRIGAN, J. This is an appeal from an order sustaining a general demurrer to the plaintiff's first amended complaint without leave to amend. Since the appeal was taken Mary E. Loeber, who commenced the action, has died, and the administratrix of her estate has been substituted as plaintiff and appellant.

The purpose of the action is to obtain a decree declaring a homestead acquired by the defendant from the government of the United States to be community property of the intestate and defendant, who were husband and wife at the time of the initiation of the proceeding for the grant of the homestead. From the complaint it appears that the deceased and defendant were married in the year 1888. In 1914 they separated and did not thereafter live together. About two months after said separation, to wit, in December, 1914, the defendant made a homestead entry upon the land in question. Subsequently an action for divorce was commenced by said wife, and in the month of October, 1916, she was granted a final decree of divorce from the defendant. About two years thereafter, the defendant having made his final proof upon the homestead application, and complied with the laws of the United States in that regard, a patent to the land was issued to him. It is disclosed by the amended complaint that in the meantime his divorced wife had remarried, and she commenced this action shortly after the defendant received said patent. The complaint also alleges that between December, 1910, and October, 1914, when the parties separated, the deceased had advanced to the defendant or on his account $600, $400 of which was for living expenses, and $200 for the purpose of securing the relinquishment by one Melvina A. Lot of a desert land entry on the property the subject of this controversy. The money so alleged to have been furnished by the deceased to the defendant was advanced prior to the entry and settlement on the land by the defendant. The complaint further alleges that no adjustment of the property rights of the parties was sought or made by agreement between them in the divorce action, or otherwise.

[1] No objection is urged by the defendant that this action may not be maintained on the ground that the property rights of the parties should have been settled in the divorce proceeding; nor could such objection very well be made in view of the position taken by the authorities in this state on the subject. Where the plaintiff in an action for divorce does not set forth that there is any property whatever belonging to the community, nor ask for any judgment or determination concerning it, a decree in such a case being for divorce simply, does not conclude either of the parties in respect to their claims otherwise existing to the community property. Coats v. Coats, 160 Cal. 67, 679, 118 Pac. 441, 36 L. R. A. (N. S.) 844.

Coming now to the sole controverted question in the case, namely, was the homestead acquired by the defendant, under the circumstances related, his separate property or community property? It is contended by plaintiff that the right to the patent subsequently issued having been acquired during the existence of the marriage, although not perfected until after its dissolution, the perfected title when issued related back to its inception, and the property must be regarded as having been acquired during coverture, and therefore community property.

[2] This position is not maintainable in this state. The grant of said homestead by the United States to the defendant was a gift or donation, and therefore it became his separate property. All property acquired by either spouse before marriage, and that acquired after marriage by gift, bequest, devise, or descent, with the rents, issues, and profits thereof, is separate property. All other property acquired after marriage by either husband or wife or both is community property. Civ. Code, §§ 162–164. In the federal cases it seems to be assumed that the homestead is a gift from the government. In the case of Smith v. Townsend, 148 U. S. 490, at page 497, 13 Sup. Ct. 634, at page 636 (37 L. Ed. 533), Mr. Justice Brewer says: "The general homestead law gives right of homestead to persons possessing certain qualifications," etc. And in the same case the court holds that no one shall enjoy the bounty of Congress unless he can qualify as an entryman. In the case of Oscar O. Reeg, 40 L. D. page 206, the following language is used:

"The object of the homestead laws is the donation of public lands to persons, seeking to establish and maintain agricultural homes thereon," etc.

In the case of Anderson v. Carkins, 135 U. S. 483, at page 487, 10 Sup. Ct. 905, at page 906 (34 L. Ed. 272), the same learned justice, in passing upon the alienability of a homestead says:

"The theory of the homestead law is that the homestead shall be for the exclusive benefit of the homesteader. Section 2290 of the Revised Statutes provides that a person applying for the entry of a homestead claim shall make affidavit that, among other things, 'such application is made for his exclusive use and benefit, and that his entry is made for the purpose of actual settlement and cultivation, and not either directly or indirectly for the use or benefit of any other person.'"

And on page 488 of 135 U. S., on page 906 of 10 Sup. Ct. (34 L. Ed. 272), of the same case, it is said, in stating the argument pro and con in a similar case:

"On the other hand, it is contended, that the homestead is a gift from the government to the homesteader, conditioned upon his occupation for five years, and upon his making no disposition or alienation during such term."

In this last case it is not held, as stated in Adams v. Church, 193 U. S. 511, 24 Sup. Ct. 512, 48 L. Ed. 769, that the homestead is a gift from the government to the homesteader upon certain conditions subsequent. However, the question is settled in this state by the case of Noe v. Card, 14 Cal. 577. In that case Noe, under the Mexican government was granted a 50-vara lot in San Francisco subject to the conditions that within one year the lot should be fenced and have a house built thereon, and the payment of certain municipal fees established by law. The entryman at the time of filing his application for the grant was married. The wife died after the grant was completed, and the question arose as to whether the property so acquired was community property, which question resolved itself into the inquiry whether the grant in question was a donation or a sale. It was held to be the former, and consequently to be the separate property of the donee; for, although certain conditions were attached to the grant they were held not to be onerous since they consisted in the expenditure of money and labor upon the land itself and for the benefit of the grantee, and not for the benefit of the grantor or persons other than the grantee, only conditions of that character being classed as onerous in a grant. In that case Mr. Justice Field, speaking for the court, said:

"In the present case, the donee solicited the premises for the purpose of erecting a house. This purpose is expressed in his petition, and he and his wife and heirs are estopped from denying that he desired it for that purpose. * * * It must be taken, then, as true that such was the case. The premises were not, therefore, the less gratuitously given or the less valuable to him, because granted subject to the conditions of their appropriation to that end. The house and fence were to be built for the benefit of the donee, and not for the government. There was, therefore, no consideration in the performance of these acts, moving to the government, which can be regarded in the nature of a price, which is essential in all contracts of sale. The condition requiring the construction of a house within a year, was very generally annexed to grants made under the Mexican government in California. * * * The performance of the condition was exacted in furtherance of the general policy of the republic to induce settlements, and not as a price to the government upon any notion of a sale."

The court then addressed itself to a consideration of certain Texas cases, saying that they undoubtedly support the contrary position, that property thus acquired is community property, and, speaking of the case of Yates v. Houston, 3 Tex. 433, the court says:

The court holds the property to be "community property on two grounds. (1) That the commissioner's fees, office fees, stamp, paper, surveying fees, etc., were required by law before the title issued; and (2) that the condition of cultivation annexed to the grant was onerous. * * * The error, as we conceive, of this decision consists in regarding the fees paid to the officers, and the services rendered in settling upon the land, as constituting a valuable consideration in the nature of a price to the government. The fees incurred in making the survey and in issuing the title papers were altogether incidental to the grant and formed no part of its consideration, and the services rendered in the settlement were directly for the benefit of the grantee, and only collaterally and remotely for the benefit of the government."

The same principle is laid down in Fuller v. Ferguson, 26 Cal. 547, Wilson v. Castro, 31 Cal. 421, and Hood v. Hamilton, 33 Cal. 698. See, also, Estate of Lamb, 95 Cal. 397, 30 Pac. 568; Estate of Boody, 119 Cal. 402, 51 Pac. 634; Harris v. Harris, 71 Cal. 314, 12 Pac. 274; Morgan v. Lones, 80 Cal. 317, 22 Pac. 253; Wadkins v. Producers' Oil Co., 130 La. 308, 57 South. 937; Id., 227 U. S. 368, 33 Sup. Ct. 380, 57 L. Ed. 551; 21 Cyc. 1627, 1658.

In Washington a doctrine contrary to that followed in Noe v. Card is established, the cases in that state holding that when the entryman is a married man at the time of filing his application for a homestead, and he and his wife reside upon the property and do the work necessary to acquire title thereto, such homestead when patent is issued is community property. In such a case the land, for the purpose of fixing the relative rights of the entryman and his wife, is regarded as having been acquired by purchase, the consideration being the settlement upon and improvement of the land, in which the wife participates with the husband. Kromer v. Friday, 10 Wash. 621, 39 Pac. 229, 32 L. R. A. 671; Ahern v. Ahern, 31 Wash. 334, 71 Pac. 1023, 96 Am. St. Rep. 912; Buchser v. Morss, 202 Fed. 854, 121 C. C. A. 212. Under one of the latest cases in that state, however, it is clear that the homestead in the instant case would be held to be the separate property of the defendant, for it is there held that when the marital relation does not exist at the time of the original settlement and entry, and continue until final proof is made, the land should be held to be the separate property of the spouse who finally acquires the patent to the land. Teynor v. Heible, 74 Wash. 222, 133 Pac. 1, 46 L. R. A. (N. S.) 1033. We have seen that in the case at bar the defendant and his wife were already separated when the former initiated the entry, and his wife never lived on the land nor assisted in its cultivation and improvement, and the marriage was dissolved by final decree of divorce more than two years before the making of final proof and receipt of patent.

[3] Granting, as we must, that any portion or all of the $600, alleged to have been advanced by the deceased to the defendant, was for the purpose of assisting him in his undertaking with respect to the land in question, this would not affect the title to or character of the property. This money constituted a loan to the defendant, giving rise to a right of action if not repaid. Carlson v. Carlson, 10 Cal. App. 300, 101 Pac. 923. This point was also in effect decided in the case of Noe v. Card, supra, where it was said that whatever was expended by the community existing between Noe and his wife constituted a claim in its favor against the estate of Noe, but did not affect the title to the property, for that was fixed by the terms of the grant, which was to the husband alone. See also Fuller v. Ferguson, supra. It follows that if labor and expenditures incurred by the community for the improvement of the separate property of one of the parties cannot change its character, mere money advances by the wife to the husband, although made to enable him to acquire title to public lands, will not do so, but may be recovered as a claim against him.

The order is affirmed.

SMITH et al. v. BACH et al. (Civ. 3614.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. June 4, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 1, 1921.)

1. Vendor and purchaser ⇐334(1) — Buyers under illegal and void contract entitled to recover payments.

A contract for the purchase of land being illegal and void, the buyers received no consideration for their payments, and they were entitled immediately to sue for and recover such payments.

2. Limitation of actions ⇐65(1)—Time within which buyers of land under void contract could sue for payments could not be postponed through delay in repudiation.

Where the buyers of land under an illegal and void contract were entitled to recover back their payments for which the consideration had failed, in the absence of appearance of equitable considerations relieving them from the effect of the rule, the time within which they might bring action, specified by Code Civ. Proc. § 339, subd. 1, could not be postponed by them through delay in their repudiation of the purported contract.

3. Vendor and purchaser ⟸341(1½)—Sellers of land under void contract, who each received payments, not jointly liable.

Where sellers of land received sums of money from the buyers under a contract illegal and void, each seller receiving part of the sums paid, the facts did not create a joint liability, and the buyers, suing to recover their payments as money had and received, were not entitled to enforce a joint liability against both sellers.

4. Appeal and error ⟸918(1)—Application of leave to amend answers presumed to have been properly made, etc.

In the absence of the record of proceedings relative to the filing of amendments to defendants' answers, except a minute order reciting the amendments were offered, were objected to by counsel for plaintiffs, and by the court ordered filed, it will be presumed on appeal that the application for leave to amend was properly made, and for sufficient reasons was allowed.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; C. N. Andrews, Judge.

Action by Clara L. Smith and others against George J. Bach and John Borgh. From judgment against defendant Borgh only for less than amount claimed, plaintiffs appeal. Judgment affirmed.

F. G. Blood, of San Diego, for appellant.

Sweet, Stearns & Forward and Clifford C. Pease, all of San Diego, for respondents.

CONREY, P. J. This action is one in assumpsit for money had and received. The case was once tried and judgment entered in favor of the defendants. On appeal to the Supreme Court that judgment was reversed. Smith v. Bach (Sup.) 191 Pac. 14. By the terms of the present judgment plaintiffs have failed to recover anything against the defendant Bach, and their recovery against the defendant Borgh has been limited to an amount less than their claim. Plaintiffs appeal from this judgment.

[1, 2] As determined on the former appeal, the contract which the parties attempted to make, providing for a sale of land by the defendants to the plaintiffs, was void because made in violation of a law so framed that its effect is to impose that penalty. September 5, 1911, was the date of the contract. This action was commenced on March 4, 1916. Payments were made by the plaintiffs first to the defendant Bach, and thereafter to the defendant Borgh. All of the payments to Bach, and some of those made to Borgh, were made more than two years prior to the commencement of this action. On these facts the trial court determined that as to all payments made more than two years before the commencement of the action the right of action is barred by the provisions of subdivision 1, section 339, of the Code of Civil Procedure. The judgment against Borgh covers only payments made within said period of two years. We think that the statute of limitations was correctly applied by the lower court to the facts found. The contract being illegal and void, the vendees received no consideration for the payments made by them, and they were entitled immediately to sue for and recover those payments. Richter v. Union Land, etc., Co., 129 Cal. 367, 373, 62 Pac. 39. Being so entitled, and there appearing no equitable consideration relieving them from the effect of the rule, the time within which they might bring this action could not be postponed by them through delay in their repudiation of the purported contract. Thomas v. Pacific Beach Co., 115 Cal. 136, 142, 46 Pac. 899; Vickrey v. Maier, 164 Cal. 384, 389, 129 Pac. 273. In this the case differs from the instance of a valid contract, performance of which is prevented by fault of the vendor occurring at some time after the payments were made.

[3] Appellants contend that they were entitled to a joint judgment against both defendants. To support their position, they refer to decisions which are to the effect that where two or more make a joint promise, each is liable for the whole debt or liability. Therefore they say that neither of those parties can be released from the joint liability which he assumed when he signed the contract. This argument implies the erroneous assumption that the action of plaintiffs is upon the contract. But the action is upon an implied obligation, arising from the fact that there was no contract. The complaint charges that the defendants received certain sums of money to and for the use of the plaintiffs. The court found that certain sums were paid by plaintiffs to the defendant Bach, and certain other sums to the defendant Borgh. These facts did not create a joint liability.

[4] Appellants further insist that the amendments to answers of the defendants, which by order of court were permitted to be filed on the day of the trial, were improperly allowed to be filed; that this is so because "no claim was made or order entered, stating that the amendment was in the furtherance of justice; no notice of intention to ask leave of court to file same was given, and no service of copy made upon plaintiff." There is no record of the proceedings relating to the filing of those amendments, except a minute order which recites that the amendments were offered, were objected to by counsel for plaintiffs, and by the court ordered filed. What those objections were is not made to appear. It will be presumed that the application for leave to amend was properly made, and for sufficient reasons was allowed.

The judgment is affirmed.

SMITH et al. v. BORGH et al. (Civ. 3645.)

(District Court of Appeal, Second District, Division 1, California. June 3, 1921.)

Appeal and error ⟸801(4) — Motion to dismiss appeal denied where questions raised could be decided on the merits.

A motion to dismiss an appeal on grounds which involved questions which could be decided on the merits will be denied.

Appeal from Superior Court, San Diego County; C. N. Andrews, Judge.

Action by Clara L. Smith and others against George J. Bach and John Borgh. From the judgment against the latter, only, he appeals, and plaintiffs move to dismiss. Motion to dismiss appeal denied.

C. C. Pease, of San Diego, for appellant Borgh.

F. G. Blood, of San Diego, for respondents Smith and others.

Sweet, Stearns & Forward, of San Diego, for respondent Bach.

CONREY, P. J. This is a motion by the plaintiffs to dismiss the appeal of defendant Borgh. The notice of appeal was directed to appellant's codefendant as well as to the plaintiffs. An appeal by the plaintiffs from the same judgment is pending in this court. By stipulation between the attorney for plaintiffs and the attorney for appellant Borgh, it was agreed that the record or transcript of the judgment roll and of the records of this cause, served and filed by the plaintiffs in their appeal, shall constitute the transcript or records of same for the purposes of the appeal of Borgh. That transcript is on file in the other appeal (No. 3614, 199 Pac. 1106.) Appellant Borgh, desiring to present a further record by a bill of exceptions, obtained from the attorney for plaintiffs, but not from defendant Bach or his attorneys, a stipulation extending the time for presenting the bill of exceptions, and thereafter the bill of exceptions was allowed and settled by the judge in accordance with the consent thereto of the attorneys for plaintiffs.

The plaintiffs now contend that the appeal should be dismissed because only two questions are raised by the exceptions, and because an examination of the transcript and bill of exceptions discloses the fact that this court cannot consider either of the questions raised by those exceptions. One of those exceptions is stated to be "refusal of the court to hold that this action is barred by the judgment entered in action No. 24257." It is a sufficient answer to this motion that the answer of appellant Borgh, as shown in the judgment roll, pleaded the judgment entered in said former action as a bar to the present action, and that the findings of fact do not refer to that defense. The bill of exceptions contains matters pertinent to that issue, which will require consideration when we consider the appeal on its merits.

Counsel for plaintiffs argue that the interest of the defendant Bach being adverse to the interest of defendant Borgh in this action, the bill of exceptions must be disregarded because Bach was not a party to the stipulation purporting to extend beyond the statutory period the time for serving and filing such bill of exceptions. But the question as to whether or not Borgh and Bach were joint obligors to the plaintiffs, and the question whether or not for that reason the interest of Bach is adverse to the interest of Borgh in this appeal, are matters which likewise should be considered when we come to the merits of the appeal.

The record is properly certified, and is at least sufficient to show an appeal made in good faith, upon grounds relied upon by appellant. Therefore the motion to dismiss is denied.

POSTAL TELEGRAPH-CABLE CO. v. CITY AND COUNTY OF SAN FRANCISCO. (Civ. 3759.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 1, California. June 14, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 13, 1921.)

Eminent domain ⟸2(1)—Municipal street railroad extension proprietary function constituting taking property.

Action of a municipality operating a street railroad in extending the system and so locating its tracks as to necessitate that a telegraph cable company relocate manholes giving access to its conduits held within the exercise of the municipality's proprietary and not its governmental functions, so that the telegraph company could recover for the cost of relocating the manholes; the telegraph cable company in its occupancy of the street having been acting under the Post Roads Act Cong. July 24, 1866 (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 10072–10077), and Civ. Code, § 536.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; George A. Sturtevant, Judge.

Action by the Postal Telegraph-Cable Company, a corporation, against the City and County of San Francisco, a municipal corporation. From judgment for plaintiff, defendant appeals. Affirmed.

George Lull, City Atty., and D. S. O'Brien and Chas. S. Peery, Asst. City Attys., all of San Francisco, for appellant.

Willard P. Smith, of San Francisco, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. The plaintiff and respondent herein is a telegraph corporation operating under the provisions of an act of Congress enacted on July 24, 1866, commonly known as the "Post Roads Act" (U. S. Comp. St. §§ 10072–10077), and is a public utility within the meaning and effect of the Public Utilities Act of the state of California (St. 1915, p. 115), and as such it had established, maintained, and operated, as a part of its interstate and foreign telegraph system, wires inclosed in conduits along and beneath the surface of Market street in the city of San Francisco prior to and since the years 1916 and 1917; the means of access to such conduits being certain "manholes" extending thereto from the surface of said street. At some time prior to the year 1916 the said city and county of San Francisco, the defendant and appellant herein, had constructed and was engaged in maintaining and operating a municipal street railway system upon and along certain of its streets, including a portion of Market street east of its junction with Geary street, and in the latter year concluded to extend its said municipal street railway system out Market street from its said junction with Geary street to Van Ness avenue, and accordingly notified the plaintiff herein that it was about to construct such extension, and that in so doing its tracks were to be so located that the means of access to the plaintiff's conduits through said manholes would be destroyed, and it therefore demanded that the plaintiff proceed to move its said manholes so that the same would not interfere with the construction of the defendant's street railway tracks along the line of said proposed extension. The plaintiff at first refused to move said manholes unless the defendant would pay the cost of such removal, but the defendant refused to do this, at the same time threatening to proceed with the construction of its tracks with the resultant destruction of the plaintiff's said property. In order to prevent this result the plaintiff, under protest removed and rearranged its manholes and approaches to its said conduits at a cost of $1,288.72, and thereafter brought this action for the recovery of said sum. Judgment was rendered in its favor therefor, and from such judgment this appeal has been taken.

It may be stated at the outset that it is conceded by the appellant that the city and county of San Francisco, while engaged in the operation of its municipal street railway system, is acting in a proprietary and not in a governmental capacity. It has, in fact, been so decided in the case of Vale v. Boyle, 179 Cal. 180, 175 Pac. 787. It is, however, contended by the appellant that while the municipality may be acting in a proprietary capacity in the operation of its municipal street railway system, it was acting in a governmental capacity in determining that it would engage in the operation of the same and in the selection of the route or right of way over which it would operate the same; and since the interference with and threatened destruction of the plaintiff's manholes arose out of and was incidental to the selection by the municipality of this particular route for the proposed extension of its already established municipal railway system, the plaintiff is without a remedy for the outlay to which it was thereby compelled.

We are unable to follow this refinement on the part of the appellant in its attempted application to the facts of the instant case. The municipality had for some considerable time prior to the date when this controversy arose been actually engaged in the operation of its municipal railway system along Market street to its junction with Geary street and thence out Geary street to and along Van Ness avenue. It proposed the further extension of its said system out Market street to its junction with Van Ness avenue, and was actually threatening to proceed with such extension with the imminent consequence of the destruction of the plaintiff's manholes when, in order to avoid such destruction, the plaintiff under protest removed and replaced the same at the cost for which this judgment was obtained. To our minds the action of the municipality thus taken and threatened was strictly within the exercise of its proprietary and not its governmental functions. We are unable to distinguish this case from the case of Los Angeles v. Los Angeles Gas & Electric Co., 251 U. S. 32, 40 Sup. Ct. 76, 64 L. Ed. 121. In that case it appeared that the city of Los Angeles, which for some time had been engaged in the erection, construction, and operation of a distributing system for the distribution and sale of electric energy to be used for the lighting of its streets and public places of said city and for supplying its inhabitants with electricity for illumination and other purposes for remuneration, enacted an ordinance requiring various persons, firms, and corporations then maintaining in the streets and public places of said city certain appliances for the distribution and sale of electric energy, to remove or relocate the same at the expense of the owners thereof. The Los Angeles Gas & Electric Company, being one of the private corporations affected by said ordinance, commenced an action to enjoin the enforcement thereof upon the ground that its enforcement entailed the taking and destruction of the plaintiff's property without compensation. Upon the trial of the cause the court held the ordinance to be void for that reason and enjoined its enforcement. In so doing the court held that in the enactment of the ordinance in question the city of Los Angeles was acting in the exercise of proprietary rather than of police or governmental powers; and that while so acting it could not compel the removal or destruction of the plaintiff's property without compensation. The appellant herein seeks to distinguish the case above cited from the case at bar upon the ground that in that case the city of Los Angeles was attempting to order the removal of the appliances of its competitors in the business of distributing and supplying electrical energy, while in the case at bar the city of San Francisco in the construction of its municipal railway system along the street in question is devoting said street to one of the primary purposes for which public streets are created and maintained, and in so doing is merely interfering with a secondary use of said street by plaintiff which must yield to its aforesaid primary use.

We fail to appreciate the force of this distinction. The plaintiff's acceptance and use of the portion of said street wherein its conduits and manholes were placed was something more than a mere privilege, revocable by the municipality at will. The plaintiff in its occupancy of these portions of said street was acting under the authority of the act of Congress commonly known as the Post Roads Act, which entitled it to use the streets of cities for its wires and conduits, which were a necessary part of its interstate and foreign telegraph system and service. It was also entitled to such use under the provisions of section 536 of the Civil Code of California. The occupation and use of said street under the authority thus conferred did not, of course, give to the plaintiff the right to lay its conduits or establish and maintain their approaches in such a manner as would interfere with the normal and ordinary uses of the street for purposes of travel and traffic; but it was, nevertheless, a valuable and vested right, and the property used therein a valuable property, which the city, in the exercise of the purely proprietary activity of constructing and maintaining a municipal railway system upon and along said street, could not interfere with or destroy without being subjected to the same rightful demand for compensation which a private corporation engaging in a like enterprise would be required to respond to under the law of eminent domain.

The case of In re Board of Rapid Transit Commissioners of the City of New York, 197 N. Y. 81, 90 N. E. 456, is directly in point upon this phase of the case; the question involved in that case being the right of the city of New York, in the course of the construction and operation of an underground railway along certain of its streets, to take or damage the property right or fee of abutting landowners in such streets without compensation. The court held that the use of a public street for railway purposes was not such a street or highway use for the usual and ordinary purposes for which public streets and highways are created as would justify the taking, damaging, or destruction of the property or rights of other persons in, along, or under such streets without compensation, and that the city of New York in entering upon the use of its said streets for the purposes of an underground railway was engaged in a proprietary enterprise, and was not acting in or exercising a governmental function.

We can discover no real distinction in principle between the above case and the case at bar. It is not contended that the plaintiff's conduits and established manholes and approaches thereto in any way interfered with or obstructed the ordinary uses of said street for the purposes of public travel, or that the city, in the exercise of its police power, had any such cause to order their removal or change in form or place. It was only when the municipality entered upon the proprietary enterprise of constructing, operating, and extending a municipal railway system that the properties of the plaintiff, in place under its several franchises entitling it to the use of said street, were so threatened with destruction as to render their removal and replacement imperative. Under such conditions we think the municipality was bound to pay the reasonable cost to plaintiff of the compulsory removal and replacement of its said properties, and that the judgment of the trial court awarding such compensation was correct, and should therefore be affirmed.

It is so ordered.

RUTHERFORD v. PEPPA. (Civ. 3726.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. June 24, 1921.)

1. Dismissal and nonsuit ⟸8—Plaintiff not entitled to dismiss after submission of case and statement by court of its ruling.

Where, after the court granted defendant's motion for nonsuit, defendant withdrew such motion and submitted the case, and the court had stated what its ruling would be on the evidence, it was too late for plaintiff to dismiss the action, notwithstanding Code Civ. Proc. § 581, providing that plaintiff may dismiss at any time before trial.

2. Frauds, statute of ⟸138(4)—Reasonable value of services rendered under unenforceable agreement may be recovered.

Where services were not intended to be gratuitous, but were rendered with the understanding that they should be compensated for by will, which cannot be enforced under the statute, the reasonable value of the services may be recovered.

Appeal from Superior Court, City and County of San Francisco; Daniel C. Deasy, Judge.

Action by G. B. H. Rutherford against Nina Peppa sometimes known as Nina F. Peppa, as administratrix of Elizabeth Taylor, deceased. Judgment for defendant, and plaintiff appeals. Reversed.

Geo. Ingraham, of Oakland, for appellant.

Robert Gillogley, of San Francisco, for respondent.

LANGDON, P. J. This action was commenced against the defendant as administratrix of the estate of Elizabeth Taylor, deceased, to recover for care, medical services, and board and lodging furnished to the deceased by the plaintiff and his wife. The defendant, as administratrix, had refused to allow the claims filed by the plaintiff, amounting to about $1,600, and had filed an answer denying the indebtedness. The plaintiff offered testimony that deceased had been in the habit of spending week-ends at the home of the plaintiff and his wife for about 29 years. During the last few years of her life she had not been in good health, and upon her visits to the plaintiff would frequently receive medicines from the plaintiff, who was a licensed physician. During the last eight weeks of her life, she remained with the plaintiff and his wife and died at their home. During this period she was furnished with food and care by the plaintiff and his family. Claim was made for board for the week-end visits during the period not barred by the statute of limitations, and for board and care and medical services during the last illness, as well as for the value of linen and bedding used by deceased in her lifetime, which plaintiff claimed he was obliged to destroy because of the infectious character of deceased's illness.

The defendant offered no testimony, but made a motion for a nonsuit on the ground that there was no evidence that the services were rendered under circumstances showing that compensation therefor was contemplated by the parties, and that the evidence showed that the services were rendered under a promise by the deceased that she would remember the wife of the plaintiff in her will. The court granted the motion for a nonsuit. Thereupon the attorney for the defendant stated that he wished to withdraw the motion and submit the case. Attorney for plaintiff then stated that he wished to dismiss the action, and on November 20, 1919, filed with the clerk a dismissal of the action. This motion to dismiss was opposed by the defendant. The court took the matter under consideration and on December 19, 1919, filed findings of fact and conclusions of law in favor of defendant and gave judgment accordingly.

[1] We shall dispose first of the contention of appellant that the court had no power to render a judgment in favor of the defendant in view of the fact that the plaintiff had filed a dismissal of the action before judgment. Section 581, Code of Civil Procedure, relied upon by appellant, provides that the plaintiff may dismiss his action at any time before trial. But in the present case the dismissal was not filed until the plaintiff's evidence was in and defendant had submitted the case, and the court had stated what its ruling would be on the evidence. At that time it was too late for the plaintiff to dismiss his action. Floody v. Great Northern R. Co., 104 Minn. 517, 116 N. W. 107, 932; Judge of Probate v. Abbot, 13 N. H. 21; Cohn v. Rumely, 74 Ind. 120; Walker v. Heller, 56 Ind. 298; note, Ann. Cas. 1913D, 525. The trial court had clearly stated its intention to find for the defendant and had granted the motion for a nonsuit when the plaintiff attempted to dismiss his action. The rule contended for by plaintiff would work a hardship on a defendant and subject him to endless litigation in cases where the trial court had decided that there was no merit in the action. We are therefore of the opinion that the trial court had the power to render a judgment despite the attempted dismissal by the plaintiff, which came too late.

[2] The appellant also challenges the correctness of the judgment rendered. The evidence showed that at least a portion of the services involved in plaintiff's claim were rendered with the understanding that they should be compensated for by will. The court has not found upon this question, and we shall not discuss the evidence, which may vary somewhat upon a retrial. The trial court evidently proceeded upon the theory that, if any of the services were rendered upon the understanding of the parties that they were to be compensated for in the will of deceased, such an agreement was insufficient to warrant a recovery for the reasonable value of such services where compensation by will had not been made. The recent case of Zellner v. Wassman, 193 Pac. 84, was an action in which the plaintiff attempted to recover for the breach of an agreement to make provision by will for payment for services. It was held that, although recovery could not be had upon that theory, the nonsuit was, nevertheless, improper, as plaintiff was not without his remedy. It was held that plaintiff was entitled to the reasonable value of his services upon the theory that where a party has conferred upon another, with the assent of the latter, a benefit which was not intended as a gratuity, and the recipient cannot be held upon his original promise to compensate by virtue of the statute of frauds, the law implies a promise on the part of the party receiving the benefit to pay the reasonable value of whatever has been received under the contract.

The judgment is reversed.

Action by Frank A. Daroux against Theresa Daroux. Judgment for plaintiff, and defendant appeals. Affirmed.

Frank J. Murphy and Ed. A. Cunha, both of San Francisco, for appellant.

Leon Samuels and Jos. L. Taaffe, both of San Francisco, for respondent.

RICHARDS, J. This is an appeal on the part of the defendant from a judgment in the plaintiff's favor in an action for divorce instituted by him on the ground of cruelty and in which it was also sought to have the property rights of the parties determined.

[1] There is a preliminary motion to dismiss the appeal upon the ground that the defendant, having received and retained certain portions of the property in dispute between the parties and dealt with in the interlocutory decree, has thereby lost her right of appeal. In view of the fact, however, that the settlement of the property rights of the parties to an action for divorce is a mere incident of the main purpose of the action, and also in view of the disposition of the courts to hear and determine actions for divorce upon both trial and appeal upon their merits, we have concluded to deny the motion to dismiss this appeal, and to deal with the main issue presented to us.

[2] It is conceded by the appellant that upon the main issue of cruelty the evidence offered on behalf of the respective parties is "in hopeless conflict," and for that reason the appellant does not ask this court to review the findings and conclusions of the trial court in the plaintiff's favor upon that ground of divorce; but the appellant insists that the evidence in the case is undisputed in support of her plea of condonation, and that, this being so, the trial court should have denied the plaintiff's prayer for divorce. We have examined the record upon this branch of the case, and we find it so reeking with vileness of thought, expression, and conduct as to render any review of the evidence it contains as unprintable as it is distasteful, and we shall therefore refrain from polluting the published pages of the decisions of this court with its recital. It will suffice to say that we find the evidence upon the matter of condonation as substantially in conflict as is the other evidence in the case, and hence will not disturb the finding of the trial court in that regard.

[3] The next series of errors alleged to have been committed by the trial court are those relating to the determination of the rights of the respective parties in various items of real and personal property involved incidentally in the proceedings for divorce. As to the so-called San Mateo property and the leasehold interest in certain San Francisco real estate, the evidence as to whether the same was separate property of the defendant, or the community property of both spouses, is substantially conflicting; but aside from this, the trial court, while finding these holdings to be community property, awarded all the community property to the defendant and appellant herein; and, having awarded the plaintiff a divorce on the ground of the defendant's cruelty, it is difficult to see how she could have been injuriously affected by the decree of the court in her favor as to these properties.

As to the appellant's contention in relation to the alleged error of the trial court in refusing to credit the defendant with certain sums of money claimed to have been paid by her to the plaintiff, the evidence is conflicting, the plaintiff testifying that upon a general accounting of money transactions between the parties the balance would be in his favor. We will not, therefore, interfere with the conclusions arrived at by the trial court in this regard.

Finding no error in this record, the judgment is affirmed.

GARCIA & MAGGINI CO. v. COLVIN et al.
(Civ. 3818.)

(District Court of Appeal, First District, Division 2, California. June 7, 1921. Rehearing Denied June 30, 1921. Hearing Denied by Supreme Court Aug. 4, 1921.)

1. Principal and agent ⟸145(4)—Both the agent and undisclosed principal are liable.

Where a contract is made by an agent within the scope of his employment, but without disclosing his principal, both the agent and the undisclosed principal, when discovered, are liable on the contract, and may be joined as defendants in an action thereon.

2. Frauds, statute of ⟸116(3, 4, 10)—To recover from undisclosed principal on contract required to be in writing, precedent authorization or subsequent ratification in writing must be established.

Before plaintiff can recover from a defendant as the undisclosed principal of the one by whom the contract, which was required to be in writing by Civ. Code, § 1624, subd. 4, was made, he must introduce evidence sufficient to establish either precedent authorization or subsequent ratification by the principal under Civ. Code, § 2307, and either authorization or ratification must be in writing under sections 2309, 2310.

3. Sales ⟸58—Whether party to contract was principal or agent is controversy under contract within arbitration clause.

Whether a contract for the sale of a crop of prunes was made by the seller as a principal or was made by him as agent for his wife who owned the land, is a controversy arising under the contract withi a clause requiring arbitration of such controversies, so that an action before arbitration cannot be maintained.

On Petition for Rehearing.

4. Husband and wife ⟸138(8)—Wife not estopped to deny agency of husband, who contracted as principal.

Where a buyer of a prune crop dealt with the seller as principal and as owner of the land on which the crop was to be raised, he cannot claim that the wife, who really owned the land and the crop, was estopped under Code Civ. Proc. § 1962, subd. 3, or Civ. Code, § 2334, to deny her husband's authority to act for her, since he dealt with the husband as principal and not as an agent having ostensible authority Appeal from Superior Court of Sonoma County; Thomas C. Denny, Judge.

Action by the Garcia & Maggini Company against Jennie Colvin and her husband. Judgment of nonsuit in favor of both the defendants, and plaintiff appeals. Affirmed, and petition for rehearing denied.

R. P. Tyler, of San Francisco, and Carl Barnard, of Santa Rosa, for appellant.

Geary & Geary, of Santa Rosa, for respondents.

NOURSE, J. Plaintiff appeals from a judgment of nonsuit in an action to recover damages for defendants' failure to deliver prunes under a written contract of sale between plaintiff corporation, by its agent Charles H. McDermott, and defendant Peter Colvin. By said contract, which was made March 22, 1919, about the beginning of the blossoming season, the former agreed to purchase and the latter agreed to sell 40 tons of dried prunes, at 10 cents per pound base, constituting the 1919 prune crop raised on the Colvin ranch in Sonoma county, which the contract recites is the sole and absolute property of defendant Peter Colvin. This property was in fact owned by his wife, defendant Jennie Colvin, as her separate property, Peter Colvin having no interest in either the land or the prune crop. Jennie Colvin and Peter Colvin were joined as defendants in this action on the theory that Jennie Colvin was in reality the principal because Peter Colvin acted as her agent in making the contract with plaintiff, or that his act in so doing was subsequently ratified. Defendant Jennie Colvin's answer denies that she at any time or place sold to plaintiff or that it bought of her 40 tons or any quantity of prunes. Defendant Peter Colvin in his answer denies that he owned either the land or the prunes specified in said contract, and alleges that Jennie Colvin owned the land as her separate property, and that he entered into the contract of sale with plaintiff solely as the agent of his wife, believing that he would be able to secure her ratification of his act. The contract provided that—

"Any controversy arising under this contract shall be settled by arbitration, and the submission of such controversy to arbitration in accordance herewith by each party shall be a condition precedent to the right of such party to enforce this agreement."

The motion for nonsuit was made on the ground that the submission to arbitration of the matters involved in this action was a condition precedent which had not been performed, and, on behalf of defendant Jennie Colvin on the further ground that the evidence failed to establish liability on her part under the contract as principal or otherwise—that it failed to show that Peter Colvin was acting as her agent at the time, that he had authority to do so, or that his act was ever thereafter ratified. The trial court granted the motion for nonsuit as to both defendants.

Appellant contends: (1) That both defendants had repudiated the contract, and that, the dispute being confined to the question of the legal existence of the contract, the provision therein relating to arbitration was not applicable, their repudiation amounting to a waiver of any rights under the arbitration clause; that the purpose of the provision was for the settlement by arbitration of controversies arising upon the contract as such regarding matters embraced therein, such as to quantity, quality, and condition of the prunes to be delivered; (2) that the evidence establishes the agency of Peter Colvin to act for defendant Jennie Colvin.

[1] The general rule is that where a contract is made by an agent within the scope of his employment, both the agent and the undisclosed principal, when discovered, are liable on the contract, and may be joined as defendants in an action thereon. Montgomery v. Dorn, 25 Cal. App. 666, 670, 145 Pac. 148. Plaintiff sued on the theory that Peter Colvin and his wife were both principals. Defendant Jennie Colvin denied execution of the contract in any manner. Defendant Peter Colvin alleged that he entered into the contract as agent for his wife, believing that he could subsequently procure her ratification of his act. Contrary to the recital in the contract, Jennie Colvin was the owner of both the real property and the fruit which was the subject of the contract at the time the contract was made and until its sale by her to other parties. She could not be held liable unless it was shown that she had either authorized her husband to execute the contract or had ratified his act.

[2] Her rights and obligations are determined by the Civil Code. The contract, being one for the sale of personal property at a price over $200 was required to be in writing. Section 1624, subd. 4, Civ. Code. An agency may be created by a precedent authorization or a subsequent ratification. Section 2307, Civ. Code. Oral precedent authorization is sufficient, except that authority to enter into a contract required by law to be in writing can be given only by an instrument in writing. Section 2309, Civ. Code. Subsequent ratification can be made only in the manner that would have been necessary to confer original authority. Section 2310, Civ. Code. Plaintiff made no pretense of meeting the proof necessary to hold defendant Jennie Colvin under these Code sections. The nonsuit as to her was properly granted.

As to the defendant Peter Colvin, he could have been held as a principal even though he did not own the prunes he agreed to sell. As to him, therefore, the nonsuit can be sustained only upon the first ground assigned, the failure of plaintiff to comply with the arbitration clause of the agreement.

[3] Obviously the controversies contemplated as coming within the provisions of this arbitration clause were such as might arise with relation to the subject-matter of the contract, being recognized as such by the parties thereto. The clause reads:

"Any controversy arising under this contract shall be settled by arbitration."

There were many provisions relating to quantity, quality, condition, preparation, etc., of the fruit which might have given rise to disputes. In such cases, to entitle either party to bring suit, it would have first been necessary to comply with the provisions of the arbitration clause. Besides these there was in dispute the question of Mrs. Colvin's connection with the contract, whether she had authorized its execution or subsequently ratified it. There was the question whether Peter Colvin was acting as a principal or as an agent, and the question of the market price of the prunes at the time fixed for delivery. All these questions came within the general clause of "any controversy arising under this contract."

Though Mrs. Colvin repudiated the contract and thus waived the right to insist upon the arbitration clause, the defendant Peter Colvin did not, prior to the commencement of the action, repudiate the contract either as principal or agent. As arbitration or an attempt to effect arbitration was a condition precedent to the commencement of the action, the failure to allege and prove that such course had been followed, or that plaintiff was excused from doing so, was fatal to its cause of action, and the nonsuit on that ground was properly granted as to Peter Colvin.

The judgment is affirmed.

On Petition for Rehearing.

PER CURIAM. The petition for a rehearing of the above-entitled cause is denied. When framing its complaint plaintiff claimed that Jennie Colvin was an undisclosed principal, and sued both husband and wife as principals. When it came to prove its case plaintiff claimed that Peter Colvin was an ostensible agent. In its petition for rehearing plaintiff relies upon the doctrine of estoppel to prove the agency of the husband. All the evidence is to the effect that plaintiff dealt with the husband alone as a principal and not as agent for the wife. The husband had a perfect right to enter into the contract as a principal. It was not necessary that he should be the owner of the land or of the prunes in order that he might make a valid contract of sale. Plaintiff made no effort to investigate the ownership, but relied solely on Peter Colvin's representations. It does not appear that these representations were made in the presence of Mrs. Colvin, or that she had any knowledge that they had been made.

[4] The briefs upon which appellant submitted its case contain a mere suggestion that the defendant Jennie Colvin might be estopped from denying the agency. This point is now presented as the main ground for a rehearing. It is claimed that because the wife sat silent when her husband executed the contract with plaintiff she is estopped from denying that her husband was acting as her agent. But she did not intentionally and deliberately lead plaintiff to believe that her husband was acting as her agent (section 1962, Code Civ. Proc., subd. 3), and plaintiff did not act on such belief. On the contrary, he acted upon the belief that the husband was the owner, and was signing as principal. There was no evidence that plaintiff knew that Colvin had acted as agent for his wife in other matters. If such knowledge was had before the trial, it is apparent that plaintiff did not act upon it when executing the contract. Furthermore, if it had that knowledge, it was plainly negligent in dealing with the husband as a principal.

To bind the defendant Jennie Colvin as an undisclosed principal it was necessary to prove that Peter Colvin was in fact her agent, and that he had authority to execute the contract for her, or that his act was ratified by her. This plaintiff failed to do. To escape the measure of proof thus demanded plaintiff now insists that Jennie Colvin is estopped from denying the agency. But the only acts relied on as constituting an estoppel were her silence at the time the contract was executed by which plaintiff was led to believe, not that Peter Colvin was her agent, but that he was the owner of the property and the principal.

As to the claim that the husband had ostensible authority to act for his wife, plaintiff did not make out a case. There was no evidence that the plaintiff, acting upon such ostensible authority, had "in good faith, and without want of ordinary care, incurred a liability or parted with value." Section 2334, Civ. Code; Herington v. Alta Planing Mill Co., 25 Cal. App. 620, 622, 144 Pac. 973; Armstrong v. Barceloux, 34 Cal. App. 433, 436, 167 Pac. 895; Post v. City and County Bank, 181 Cal. 238, 245, 183 Pac. 802; Wellman v. Conroy, 194 Pac. 728. And then ostensible authority cannot be asserted when the party did not know the facts relied on as showing such authority. Harris v. San Diego Flume Co., 87 Cal. 526, 25 Pac. 758.

Rehearing denied.
